There are 485 jobs you can do for the city. Here's one:

It's fair to say that Police Lt. Jimmy Samuels likes his job best on those days when he can help a fellow citizen who needs assistance. "I was always the kind of guy inclined to stop and help someone on the side of the road," he says, "so I like that aspect of the job."

Samuels, 51, came to police work by way of studies in electrical engineering and a job managing a local Radio Shack store. "On the weekends I was doing ride-alongs with my uncle (retired Police Capt. Tim Samuels). I liked what I saw. I liked the independence of the job. I liked the responsibility (police officers) have. No one is breathing down your neck. You're given assignments and expected to complete them. I also liked the respect that came with the job...."

"Finally, I got up the courage and decided I would ask my uncle if he thought I could do the job. And I was sitting in the patrol car, getting ready to ask him, when he turned to me and said, 'Why don't you put in an application?'"

During his career Jimmy has worked undercover narcotics investigations, supervised the recruiting section, and worked in professional standards and operations support. As a police lieutenant, Jimmy oversees all the officers in patrol district 3 during the day shift. He hopes to keep this assignment until he retires next June. "There's no other place I'd like to go. I started out on the street, and I want to retire on the street."

It takes an impressive breadth of job skills to keep city government running. Our employees are police officers, accountants, surveyors, truck drivers and computer programmers.

Have you thought about putting your job skills to work for the city?
