Law students tutor kids at the Hanes Hosiery Community Center.

WFU Law students making a difference at rec center

SPECIAL TO THE CHRONICLE

Allison Levene has found a unique way to relieve pressure while studying at Wake Forest Law.

"Volunteering with kids is a great way to cope with law school stress," says Levene, who has been managing the after-school tutoring and basketball program for children at Hanes Hosiery Community Center in Winston-Salem for two years. She began volunteering at the center her first year of law school with the Youth Advocacy Group student organization, for which she is now president.

Having volunteered in high school with Big Brothers, Big Sisters in her native Connecticut, Levene, who will graduate from the Law School this year, says, "Kids come naturally to me," said

Each semester there are up to five law students volunteering as tutors Monday through Thursday in any subject for children ranging in age from elementary to high school. Law students also act as basketball coaches. The building and its facilities were originally donated by Hanes Hosiery, but the center is funded by city and private donations.

Levene says one of the biggest needs for these kids is help studying for tests, especially for the annual End of Grade tests (EOGs).

How successful is the tutoring? "One young girl started the school year making all C's on her report card, then earned all A's and B's after regular tutoring," she said. "The girl came in and thanked all of the tutors when she got the news. And a mom drives from Kernersville to Winston-Salem just for the tutoring quality at Hanes compared to what is offered in her area, primarily to help her child with EOG testing."

The other focus of the

The youngsters take part in b-ball action.

program is basketball.

"It is fun, athletic, and teaches lessons in teamwork and sportsmanship," Levene said.

Center Supervisor and Coach Art Blevins and employees John Torian and Patrice Johnson work with the kids' games. In many cases, the $25 fee for basketball per season per child is covered out-of-pocket by the coaches.

"Kids from all over the community come for basketball," Levene says. "No one is going to be turned away because they can't pay."

Blevins added, "Our basketball program is designed for our kids to learn the game, learn the fundamentals and to have fun playing."

Levene says a lot of the kids at the center want to be police officers and teachers, and are looking for encouragement and role models.

"How could I go to college?" they ask the law student tutors. Their tutors reply, "You can do it! Keep coming here, do your homework, do well on tests, and stay out of trouble."

Levene won a Community Service Award in October 2013 for the work she does with the center and with the children. She was nominated by Blevins.

Two of the students from the Center won an Anti-Drug art contest as well, and photos from the awards night and the awards adorn the walls of the tutoring rooms at the community center.

Levene says her future plans definitely include continuing to volunteer in ways that help children.

"I hope to help my mother, who is launching a nonprofit in Connecticut to help children of families below the poverty line get donations for school supplies," she said.

Blevins has nothing but praise for the Wake Forest Law volunteers and their efforts.

"Allison Levene is great, she has helped me for three years now and I will miss her," he said. "She and all of the Wake Forest Law students are a blessing to me and my kids here at the center...We are blessed to have WFU Law students here and appreciate all they do!"
