for his new position, but has said there are items that will come before the council he wants to vote on before he steps down.

became a controversial topic when the council considered it last month. A split City Council had approved a process where it would've taken applications from the public and then selected who would represent the East Ward. This drew the ire of some Democrats in the ward, who demanded a special election.

The City decided to reconsider its action, but council members were unsatisfied that the only type of special election they could hold wouldn't have a primary and would instead rely on political parties to nominate the candidates.

During Tuesday's meeting, Montgomery proposed a two-part solution. First, to have an interim City Council member, nominated by the Forsyth County Democratic Party's executive committee members in the East Ward once Montgomery announced his retirement, who would be approved by the council.

The second involves the City Council crafting a local act in its General Government Committée that the General Assembly would pass authorizing special elections for council seats in Winston-Salem that would

the violence in W-S

BY TEVIN STINSON THE CHRONICLE

In response to the recent rise in violent crimes in the area, Rally Up Winston-Salem, a grassroots organization against street and gang violence, is bringing people together to share their thoughts, feelings, and solutions to the issues currently plaguing the city.

Last Saturday, Sept. 1, Rally Up launched an initiative to have open discussions with residents where most of the violence is taking place to allow everyone an open platform to express themselves. During the event titled "Project Ground Zero: Real Talk for a Real Time," held at Rupert Bell Park, more than a dozen residents came out to

The county received three proposals for the project, which has a $120 million budget. Each proposal has two companies teaming-up for the project. A majority of a committee made of county staff and stakeholders recommended Whiting-Turner Contracting, a national construction firm, which is teamed with Holt Brothers Construction, a Raleigh-based minority-owned company, founded by former football stars Terrence and Torry Holt. The commissioners, however, may choose any of the three proposals.

The other two proposals were from locally owned Frank L. Blum Construction Co. teamed with Barnhill Contracting Co. and Samet Corp. teamed with Balfour Beatty Construction. Each of the companies has an extensive portfolio of construction projects.
