Her New Perspective.

By LULU JOHNSON.

Copyrighted, 1908, by E. C. Parcells.

Aboard the liner the last goodbyes were being said. Some of the more cautious among the home stayers had already gathered at the end of the pier to wave farewells cut short on the deck through the fear of being carried off, and others were trooping down the gangplank.

Now and then a couple of cabin stewards rushed up the gangway bearing the steamer trunks and parcels of some belated arrival, and from the pier the sharp exhaust of the donkey engines punctuated the farewells as the busy drums rolled and unrolled the ropes by which the last of the hold luggage was being rushed to the cavernous depths of the huge ship.

Busy little tugs puffing about the end of the pier to assist in turning the huge bulk of the steamer, and a man in a rowboat paddled about the stern to be on hand in case of an accident.

To Nella Wynn the scene was decidedly novel. Only the day before she had arrived in New York from her inland home for the purpose of embarking, and for the first time she had realized what a steamer really was. Now she could scarcely believe that presently this great black vessel would slip down the bay and so out to the broad ocean beyond the sight of land.

For a time she was absorbed in watching the crowds, but the very presence of this crush of humanity presently began to weigh upon her spirits.

It had been hard to raise the funds to send her abroad, so none of the family had been able to accompany her to New York. She had no acquaintances in the city, and she was absolutely alone in this mob of leave takers. There was no one to stand on the edge of the pier and wave farewell, no one to give her a friendly farewell kiss. She was even more alone than the little crowd of returning emigrants huddled on the lower deck forward.

Back in Crossville it had seemed a great thing to be going to Paris to study music. Now that the venture was fairly under way only pride prevented Nella from turning back. The bigness of the city and the vastness of the sea made her feel how small and utterly insignificant she was. She wanted to lay her head on her mother's shoulder and be petted into contentment again.

Quietly she moved from the port to the starboard side of the ship, where she could watch the loading of a cargo steamer from a lighter. She tried to forget that on the port side were men and women who were to be her associates for a few days saying goodbye to their friends, while she fought back the tears of loneliness.

Then slowly the big ship began to slip out of her berth, the hoarse whistles sounding an alarm to the traffic of the harbor. Now they were in mid-stream, and one of the tugs had pressed her nose against the towering black side of the ship and begun to pant and labor as slowly the stern was pushed upstream, while the sister tug forced the bow in the direction of the Narrows.

Then the engines took on a more steady beat, and the noise of the shouting on the pier grew fainter until it could no longer be heard. The voyage was begun.

Nella waited on deck until the last faint trace of land disappeared; then she stumbled with tear blinded eyes through the narrow gangways to the little cabin which she occupied alone. She threw herself upon the cushioned seat that formed one side of the narrow compartment and gave herself up to her grief.

Even as a child her dream had been a musical career, and she had saved toward this end. Her parents, too, had pinched and denied themselves that her ambition might be gratified, and now that she was at last on her way to Paris loneliness beat down ambition and she could only sob miserably as she thought of the loved ones she was leaving behind.

The departure with no kindly word of farewell had been the last drop in her cup of unhappiness, and now she could see the familiar railroad station at Crossville, with its yellow, shelllike structure and unsheltered platform, and her friends standing there to wave the last farewell. It had been so different from the boat a few hours before, and she wished herself back with her parents and the girls and Harry Temple.

She could still see Temple's hurt look when he received her gentle "No" to his proposal. He had always sought to oppose her career, contending that she would be far happier in her own home than as a choir singer or platform star. She had hated him for his apparent disbelief in her powers, and her refusal had been promptly given. She was sure that if he asked her now she would gladly abandon her career and go back to Crossville with him, but Harry was with the rest of the dear ones nearly a thousand miles away.

There was a gentle tapping on the door, and she arose to admit the stewardess.

"There's a gentleman who would like to see you on deck," she said, with a touch of accent. "He is Mr. Temple, and he asks that he may have the pleasure of your society."

"Temple?" gasped Nella. "A tall man?"

"With a light mustache and such handsome gray eyes," assented the stewardess, mindful of the generous tip and scenting a romance. "He is on the port side of the upper deck. Permit me to assist mademoiselle with her toilet."

Without waiting for reply the woman bathed the girl's swollen eyelids and removed traces of tears from her cheeks, smoothing the hair and refreshing the crumpled bows on the hat, which had been tossed into the berth with never a thought of the ribbons.

Nella emerged from the gangway to find Temple pacing the deck impatiently. He hurried toward her as she appeared and led her to a cozy corner, where two steamer chairs were placed close together.

"I am content that you are here. That is enough for me," she said shyly. "But how did you ever get here?"

"Next train after you left," was the prompt response. "My chum at college, Jack Harkwright, is representing his father's business in Paris, and when you prepared to come I wrote asking him if he could find a place for me. I got an answer by cable to come at once."

"And you never let me know?" she said reproachfully. Temple smiled.

"I had an idea," he said softly, "that perhaps it would be better to wait until after we had left port. It's lonesome work sailing alone and—"

"You were right," said Nella. "It has shown me many things in a new light. Perhaps if you were to ask a certain question over again—"

"I do ask the question over again," he declared earnestly. "I shall never cease asking that question until your answer is 'Yes.'"

"It is 'Yes' now," she said shyly. "I see life more clearly, and love is better than a career, after all."

"And heaven's blessing on the new perspective," he said fervently as his hand clasped hers in the early dusk that was settling down upon the sea.

When it Hurt.

A German surgeon in the Franco-Prussian war had occasion to lance an abscess for a poor fellow, and as the sore was obstinate, it became necessary to use the knife twice. The operation was not a very painful one, but the patient declared that it had nearly killed him, and when a third resort to the lancet was proposed he protested that he could never go through the operation alive.

The surgeon promised to make it easy for him and, calling up a few of the loungers, ordered one of them to hold his hands close over the patient's eyes and two others to grasp his hands firmly.

"This arrangement," explained the doctor, "is said to prevent pain in such an operation. Now, lie perfectly quiet, and when I say 'Now!' prepare yourself."

The surgeon at once began quietly with his work and in a short time had completed the operation without the least trouble, the patient lying as quiet as though he slept.

When all was done the surgeon laid aside the knife and said, "Now!" Such a roar came from the lips of the sick man as seldom is heard from any human being. He struggled to free himself, yelling, "Oh, doctor, you're killing me!"

Shouts of laughter soon drowned his cries, and he was told that the operation had been all over before the signal was given. It was a good joke, but it is doubtful if the poor fellow could ever be made to believe that he did not feel actual pain immediately after that fatal "Now!"

Chinese Eating.

It is probably true that the Chinese use a greater variety of meats than do the people of other countries, although but little land is set apart for grazing or for the cultivation of food for live stock. Beef is not a common meat, principally because of the Buddhist prejudice against killing any animal and particularly such a useful one. Since hogs can be so economically reared, pork is undoubtedly, after rice, the leading article of food. This is eaten in every form, and one may say that every part of the animal is utilized for food. Horseflesh, venison, antelope and bear are not seen, but in passing through the markets pork, mutton and fowls are the most conspicuous.

For fish the Chinese have an omnivorous appetite, nothing from the water, either fresh or salt, being rejected. A few kittens and puppies may be offered for sale in cages. Those which are intended for the table are fed upon grain and clean food, so that if the nature of this food be considered it is far more wholesome than is the unclean hog. To assert that cats and dogs form a staple article of food is pure fiction.—London Standard.

FOR THE CHILDREN

Dream Meanings.
To see a wax candle you will be present at some festivity.
If you climb a wall, you will see bet ter days.
If you dream of being angry, you will have a pleasant surprise.
To pick apples, riches are in store for you.

To dream of picking violets means a new friend. If they wither, you will have sorrow.
Diamonds, if possessed, means illness. If worn, it is a good sign.

If you walk under a bridge, you will be safe from harm. To cross over, a friend will help you in a time of need.
Clear water is good to see. Frozen water means danger.

If you see Indians, you must avoid bad company.
To see a field of poppies means a pleasant future.

Green leaves, good health; falling or withered, good luck in business.
If you comb some one's hair, you will meet with ungrateful people.

You will have good luck if you see fish in clear water.
To see a flag floating on the breeze you will have honor and renown.

You will hear from an old friend if you see a sailor.
If you fall in the attempt to run, there are unfriendly people among your acquaintances.

Bookbinder.
This is a game much enjoyed by children and is played by any number, who sit in a circle, each holding a book laid flat on his clenched fists, which are held out in front of him.

One, who has been chosen book binder and stands in the middle of the circle, goes to any player and, seizing that player's book, attempts to rap his knuckles, which the holder of the book tries to avoid by pulling back his hands quickly. If the bookbinder succeeds in rapping the player's knuckles, the one rapped becomes bookbinder, and the first bookbinder takes his seat. Otherwise he replaces the book and tries with some one else.

The bookbinder may pretend to seize a book without actually doing so, and if the holder pulls away his hands so that the book falls he must take the leader's place just as if his knuckles had been rapped. The leader can make the game quite exciting if he runs quickly from one to another, pretending to take up one book and then seizing another, thus keeping the players constantly on the lookout.

Red Cap and Blue Cap.
The players seat themselves in a circle to represent tallors at work on a piece of cloth. A handkerchief or a duster will answer the purpose.

A leader, or foreman, is chosen, and every one of the company is named in turn: Red Cap, Blue Cap, Black Cap, Yellow Cap, Brown Cap, etc.

The leader then takes the piece of cloth and pretends to examine the work which is supposed to have been done by the workman.

He is supposed to discover a bad stitch and asks, "Who did it, Blue Cap?"

The latter immediately answers, "Not I, sir."

"Who then, sir?"
"Yellow Cap, sir."
Yellow Cap must then answer at once in the same manner and name another workman. Any one who fails to answer to his name pays a forfeit.

If carried on in a brisk manner, this game will cause endless amusement.

A Stone With Roots.
The visitor to the Falkland Isles scattered here and there singular shaped blocks of what appear to be weathered beaten and moss covered bowlders in various sizes. Attempt to turn one of these bowlders over, and you will meet with a real surprise, because the stone is actually anchored by roots of great strength. In fact, you will find that you are trifling with one of the native trees. No other country in the world has such a peculiar "forest" growth.

"Oh, That Tooth!"
There are no dentists in Korea. When an adult has the toothache, he is at liberty to pull the tooth or stand the ache, but when a child under twelve is thus afflicted the father and mother must give their written consent to have the tooth extracted, and three men must give their opinion in writing that they believe the patient will live through the operation. It thus takes two or three days, and by that time the ache may have stopped.

An Obliging Patient.
Arabella and her baby sister, Rachel, were playing hospital one morning and were furnishing all the patients in their own persons. In the course of events Arabella was heard to exclaim, "There, that's the fourth leg I've broken this morning!"

Molly's Philosophy.
"I'm glad that things are fixed just right," said Molly in her play.
"Before of one thing I am tired—Another's on the way."
First New Year's day leads all the rest, Then Valentine's for fun—

"Next, skating, sliding on the snow, And then the winter's done. It's just the dearest thing to watch The growing things in spring, With maple sugar first, then flowers And every pretty thing."

"I dearly love the summer time, To play the whole day through And never have to stop and warm. Put on my rubbers too, I'm sure I'm every bit as glad— When school time's really here
