The Offspring of Great Men.

(By Senior Fratrum.)

Having seen that great men as a general thing inherit their greatness from the female parent, I will now produce some in rgard to the offspring of great men, showing why there are so few great men whose fathers were illustrious.

First. Many of the brightest stars of the intellectual galaxy were never married, prominent among whom were Voltaire Pitt, the poet Montgomery, Lords Liver-pool and Clyde, Washington Irving, and many others.

Becond Many prominent men, though married, had no children. Corneille, Ra-cine, Molicre, Fox, Lords Wellesly, Palmerston, (the last three no legitimate chil-dren,) Washington, Madison, Jackson, Polk, and many other intellectual persons had no children.

Third. Intellectual persons are unfortunate in regard to male children. Napoleon, Theirs, Guizot, Shakspeare, Milton, Ben Johnson, Bacon, Newton, Locke, Reg-inalb, Heber, Lords Nelson, Hill, Lya-doch, Beresford, Clive, Brougham, Lynd-hurst, Sir C. Napier, Winfield Scott, had no male children. Pope, Fielding, Smollett, Sterne, Steele, Addison, Bolingbroke, Johnson, Goldsmith, Hayley, Coopr, John Wilkes, Humboldt, and a host of men eminent in every branch of science, were either unmarried or had no legitimate male de,

It is also lamenthly true that very intellectual men, who have male children, have the misfortune of seeing them die ere their brain is expanded. The great Duke of Marlborough lost his only son early. Burke's only son died before his father. Wobster lost his only son in the Mexican war. Many other easer might be included in this article, but it is hoped the reader will reell them to mind without their being

The corclesions drawn from this article and that on "The Mothers of Noted Men," are first : That the mother has a greater influence over character-moulding than the father. Second, That male offspring of intellectual women are more apt to live than those of intellectual men.

Fifth. Those men who inherit an active, large, intellectual brain from the father, large, intellectual brain from the father, are almost always sure to be precocious, and by straining their brain constantly to the higest activity, striving after the name of the father's greatness, they bring on physical disease, followed by mental exhaustion, thus terminating while in the bud of life the existence of those who might have been world-renowned Solomons, or far-farned Napoleons — Norfolt Day Book.
