The Two Continents United.

The great scheme of connecting the European and American shores by a telegraphic cable, has at last been consumma-ted. Taught by the failure, and the imposture which sought to conceal it, of the first effort, and cautioned by Mr. Field's dispatch that "England and America are again united by telegraph," we have felt somewhat cantious in accepting first re-ports as conclusive, lest they should de-ceive us now as before, when the ocean telegraph was either still-born or died at the birth. But we presume all reserve may be safely dismissed, and the truly extraordinary enterprise ranked as a perma-nent success, and as, without doubt, the foremest wouder of the world.

The value of this means of communication can scarcely be over-estimated. The ently active, politically, commercially and intellectually,—too active to wait for news to pass between the two shores, which all the aids of steam were nearly two weeks apart. Proceeding in ignorance of the musea, it very frequently resulted that much was done which had to be undone afterwards, while many of the mistakes were irreparable.—These sources of loss and in-jury are now at an end... The rapid inter-change of ideas, and the prompt dissemi-nation of valuable information of every deble.-These sources of loss and inscription, which the Ocean telegraph will ceure, are a less tangible, but not less im ortant advantage, secured to the world by this magnificent triumph of scientific we hall the telegraph, and we hall the first news which it brings. The Spectre of war which lately bestrode Central Europe, is laid, and Austria and Prussia have again shaken hands. This was preceded by battles that have been fought since the last of which the steamers brought us the news. In these last encounters, fortune was kind to the Austrians, both on land and on the sea,—with the Prussians and with the Italians. Perhaps this balancing of victories will male the peace more en-during, by leaving less of that wounded pride which seeks occasions for wiping out graces .- Richmond Enquirer.
