CLOVER AND GRASSES.

From the Raleigh Sentinel. First, then, as to the character of the soil. Red clover, like other grasses, grows best on good soil, but will flourish better on poor soil than most other varieties.

Any soil that produces wheat well will produce clover, but it like everything else in the vegetable kingdom, does best in those soils which are peculiarly adapted to its growth.

I have found it to succeed better on strong upland clay soils than any other. Low marshy or wet lands do not suit it. The proper time for sowing the seed in this climate is the latter part of February or the early part of March.

It will do very well any time in March, and should invariably be sown with oats or some other protecting crop. Young clover, when it first emerges from the soil, is exceedingly tender and needs something to protect it a few months from the effect of summer's sun.

The following (Texas) Gazette publishes the following marvellous story: In the Grand Canyon, in the State of Arizona, a short time ago, a gentleman in the depths of the forest suddenly came upon a woman as wild and almost as fit as an untamed deer.

After a long chase of some distance, the gentleman on horseback overtook the wonderful creature, which she had, and he found her to be a medium sized, middle-aged well-formed woman, with long, dark hair, and clear blue eyes.

She was in a state of nudity, save a giraffe of grey moss about her loins. Her body and limbs were covered with a beautiful coat of hair about four inches in length.

As straight as possible until within a few feet of the top, and then putting on a heavy topping of straw. I may remark, in this connection, that clover hays are more easily damaged by rain in curing than most other kinds, but if the weather be favorable it is rather more easily cured.

I have said nothing about the value of clover as a green manure, or as a means of improving the soil, as this communication is already much longer than I had intended. Suffice it to say, however, that as a vegetable manure for plowing under, and particularly as a preparation for a wheat crop, I regard it as superior to anything else.

It is best always to succeed clover with wheat, there is at times a difficulty in getting a good stand of corn after it, owing to the increased quantity of worms produced, from some cause which I have been unable to discover.
