

LETTERS FROM "ITINERANT"

BEAUFORT HARBOR, Near Coast, N. C. April 16, 1868.

FISH. The great attraction of these waters is the fish. There are two kinds, the shell fish and the scale fish. The former embraces the oyster, the clam, the scallop, the mussel, and the crab. They are all abundant. The oyster, like the mussel, is improved by transplanting. They are found in immense beds, or singly, clinging to logs of wood, piles, or even to the bottoms of ships. They are not so good, however, wild as tame. They are taken up from their promiscuous places of abode, and carried into the mouths of rivers and left there one or two years. These river mussels, or other still water oysters, furnish a name for these cultivated oysters—they go by the name of cove oysters. They are to the other oysters, what Berkshire pigons are to those long, lean, and sleek Lancaster hogs.

A TIGHT FIT. The oystermen here tell a story about a Sea Gull and an Oyster. Some time last year a gull was found dead with his bill caught in an oyster, between the shells. The verdict of the inquest was, that the gull, in attempting to pick the oyster out of his shell by pecking, but the unwilling oyster closed upon him, and that instead of the bill gnawing the oyster, the oyster gnawed the bill. The jury "hung" awhile—one captious detail contended that instead of an oyster in a bill, it was a bill in an oyster.

CLAMS. What gives a clam his repute, I have never known. It is an oyster, with a smooth shell; the meat yellow, and very tough. Clam soup is relished by the natives; but it has a fishy taste, and is as tough as bits of raw hide—not quite as tough. They are not wholesome—they are no inducement to the wholesome. They are abundant, and lie about sandy, marshy beaches, and are picked up one at a time.

SCALLOPS. The scallop is a beautiful shell fish—when washed. Its habitation is in mud. Fishermen row out to the spots frequented by them and they then wade in and feel for them with the foot, and lift them with the hand. It is the size of the clam, but has a far thinner shell, scalloped in shape. But a small part of the meat is eaten—the heart. This makes it expensive. It takes a large pile to make a meal.

CONCHES. The most delicate and beautiful shell, on the parlor table, was once the home of a living fish. Its inhabitant, like the small, at times ventures out a little, but it comes very cautiously, and retreats again on a very small account. It is a pulp, and looks as little like an eatable creature as an earth worm. These are conchs and they vary much in size shape and color. They are abundant here—all sizes, shapes and colors, rough surface and smooth pear shaped, spiral, thick and thin, ovate, long and short.

CRAB. One of the elegant looking of all the denizens of the deep, down here, is the crab. He has all legs and feet. They abound in shallow waters. Crab fishing is a sport that soon wearies out, however—it is like a conquest too easily made. You simply tie a piece of meat—a frog will do—to one end of a line and "throw in" soon you find something biting and pulling at your bait. Now pull gently—the crab keeps hold; draw up your line, and the crab follows like a fool; and he holds on until you lift him into your boat; then when he sees into the lake, and he is captured, he is furious, biting and scratching spitefully. Some like the meat and some dislike it. I am in class 2, foot of the class.

SEA TURTLES. One of the sports of the coast, is catching sea turtles. They are very numerous and very large; and they make fine food. There are three methods of catching them. One is, for two men to go out to the sea, in a canoe, and row up among the turtles; one man springs from the boat to a turtle's back and grabs the animal by the shell, the soft, tender part. He must get outside the turtle, horse-back fashion. The frightened creature dives, but his rider soon brings him to the surface again by dipping his fingers deeper into his neck. As they rise, the second man of the turtle party stands ready to lay hold of the animal fine or legs and dumps him into the boat. This is the romantic dime novel method, and attended with the liability of getting the clothes damp. Another, and the most common way is to spread a net for them, which is a very successful way.

Another way is this. In April the females come inside the harbor to deposit their eggs in the sandy beaches. They forget that they have left the deep sea, and paddling and flapping to shallow water along with the tide, until a sudden lash of a wave throws them on their backs. They are then utterly helpless. A sea turtle on his back is as helpless as a defeated candidate after an election, and about as cheap looking. The meat of this creature makes rich soup—a treat among plebeians. But it is excessively rich—greasy as the old folks used to call it. But the soup gains its repute, like a fashionable lady's hat, from the trimmings. The skeleton or sub-station is rather a joke than otherwise. It has to have wine, spices, peppers, sauces, etc., etc., to make it palatable. When thus fixed, it goes down without any choking. Fish makes a good fertilizer. It is not as lasting as bone dust and many other fertilizers, but more speedy in its effects. Fish manure can be made in immense quantities, as any one will conclude upon a glance at the map of eastern North Carolina. Water covers a very large proportion of the surface, and the immense swamps and other waters of this section are

The composition used in these Pills is carefully prepared by the hand of the discoverer, and may be used by the most feeble patient in the most delicate situation, either male or female; and from their peculiar combination are highly strengthening and in their action on the bowels, and indeed, in a climate like ours, whose colds and coughs are almost an unending consequence of the sudden changes to which all are subject, every one at all liable to suffer from the influence of these causes, will find the greatest security in having his liver and bowels well cleaned by these admirable Pills.
