THE TWO PORTRAITS.

BY WILLIE E. PABOR.

· [A painter, in his rambles, met a child so beautiful. that he determined to paint his portrait and keep it ever by him. Afterward, he sought to find one the very opposite. After searching many years, he found a fit subject in a murderer awaiting the moment of his execution. On inquiry, the painter discovered his portraits to be of one and the same person.]

> An artist roamed the wide, wide world. To etch the beautiful and true: He sketched where Scotia's banner furled .-The chamois and the hunter too. . He pictured England's scenery And passed through Erin's rugged isle; Then, 'neath the suns of Italy, His touch made canvass glow and smile.

Ere long he met a little child. So beautiful, so seraph-formed-That never in his dreams most wild, Such image in his mind had warmed. 'I'll limn this angel child,' he said, 'His like I'll never see again; ·His form shall hover o'er my head, The antidote of care and pain.'

When to the painter trouble came, And evil passions moved his breast-That portrait kindled up a flame, That bade all evil be at rest. 'Twas then he said-' If I can find A being to contrast to him-The fiercest demon of mankind Conceivable, his form Til Hum.'

Years passed away, ere met he aught Fit image for the artist's power; Then in a distant clime he sought. And found it in a favored hour, Within a dungcon's gloomy cell, Chained in his almost living tomb: Nothing but curses from him fell, Waiting the moment of his doom,

The canvass heath the pencil glowed, And soon the painter's work was done: Finished within the dark abode, Unlit by one stray beam of sun, The contrast pen can never tell The angel child-the man; One was a heaven—the other hell--A blessing one, and one a ban.

Picture his mournful feelings when On inquiry the painter knew, The angel child of early ken, Had to the demon murderer grew. The beautiful the innocent, To life, to love, had proved a ban--A hell had with a heaven blent, In scraph child and demon man!

It contains directions for the different meals with economical hints too often neglected by our American ladies, but familiar to those of highest rank in England. The directions for meals for the nursery, and for comforts for the sick room, are not found in any other book of the kind we have met with. They are invaluable.
