SMALLER YIELD
Both Shanklin and County Agent Clifford Ammons cited the 1950 North Carolina cotton take as the smallest, both in acreage and yield, in the State's history.

In Harnett alone the yield was 10,000 bales below the 1949 production of 17,000 bales, they said. This shortage, due in great part to insects made by boll weevils, was apparent all across North Carolina's cotton belt, according to Ammons.

Shanklin showed that insect pest control through dusting and other means can increase the lint yield here tenfold in a single growing season. Using experiments in Scotland County for illustration, he said that poison treated fields yielded over 2,100 pounds of seed cotton per acre, while untreated fields gave slightly more than 200 pounds per acre. The difference in money terms, he stated, meant about $1,500,000 in increased revenue for Scotland's cotton growers.

BOLL WEEVIL IS LIABILITY
County Agent Ammons agreed that the greatest liability working against h ghlyields in Harnett is improper insect pest control. In experiments run in this county, he declared, five controlled farms turned out five times as much as cotton as did a similar number of non-treated farms.

"That's where that 10,000 bales went last year," he said. Shanklin said that the control program must be put over not only with the big farmers and the manufacturers, but with the "man at the end of the row" and even the tenant farmer. With war facing the nation, greater efforts must be made in the production of record crops for home and overseas use, he declared.

The little girl's plight was discovered two weeks before Christmas when her parents noticed she was trouble seeing her toys as she played about the house. At that time, doctors advised that both her eyes be removed "immediately." Later, they said one eye might be spared, but she would be almost blind in it, too.

Mrs. Keller, 70, who was left blind and deaf by illness when she was an infant, sent word to the Purcells that even if totally blind Carolyn Joan could be "stimulated to overcome her handicap and win her share of normal life."
