WINDSOR—Using 100-200 pounds of muriate of potash per acre as a side application for cotton has proved to be profitable for three Bertie County farmers.

J. P. Woodard, Bertie farm agent for the State College Extension Service, says lint yields were increased up to 300 pounds per acre. The cotton also was of better quality and easier to pick.

Woodard says the three farmers will plant peanuts on the same land next year and observe the residual effect of the potash on this crop.

That's right! North Carolina is in first place among the 12 Southeastern States in amount of generating capacity and kilowatt hours generated for public use during 1950. In fact, the report*, which was issued recently, shows only ten states in the nation with more electric power than North Carolina, regardless of population, concentration of industry, or government-built power projects.

Power companies in the six are busy right now adding still more generating capacity which will produce still more billions of kilowatt hours of dependable electricity. Barring situations beyond our control, such as inability to get steel, copper and other vital construction materials, North Carolina will continue to have plenty of power for the state to maintain its position of industrial leadership among the Southeastern States.
