would then rush into the lungs, through the tiny trachea tube that had been inserted in his throat.

A nurse rushed in with two hospital gowns. "Here," she commanded, "put these on before you go near him." We slipped them on, meanwhile watching another woman intensely absorbed in her work.

"She is the special-duty nurse," the doctor explained: "we have three of them, right around the clock. All are specially trained for this type of work."

We went over to the respirator and stood by Chuck's head. He was unconscious, very pale. His eyelids fluttered in a troubled sleep. I looked through the glass part of the iron lung and saw the thin frame covered with a light blanket.

The doctor came over. "You might try talking to him, but I don't know how much good it'll do. He's had hypox to relieve the pain."

Norma looked up quickly. "Is it painful?"

"Oh yes," he said. "This lad is just going through the fever that strikes with polio. This is when the virus attacks and does its damage. It gets into the spinal cord and brain. In bulbar polio, it attacks the bulb or base of the brain, where the centers of respiration are located. Then the muscles go into spasms."

I leaned over Chuck and touched his forehead. He opened his eyes a little. They were glazed and red.

"Hi, Chuck," I said, and our hearts leaped as he seemed to comprehend.

Norma ran her fingers through his matted shock of hair.

"Hello, sonny," she said, and her voice had the music of a thousand violins: "you're getting better, darling. Just think of that. You're getting better now."

I was astonished. I could have sworn that she would go completely to pieces, with our son lying so close to death. But here she was, lifting him from the bleak hopelessness of this atmosphere with the buoyancy of her words.

Again she repeated them, and motioned for me to follow suit. I took up the cue.

"Remember the time you wrestled Mike two out of three falls and beat him?" I said. "Well, they think you're a little sick right now but you're going to beat this too. You'll show 'em, won't you?"

He tried to turn his head but couldn't. His eyes rolled in my direction, then closed with the effort. We stroked his head.

"We won't go away," Norma whispered to him. "We'll be right here so you get some sleep and you'll feel better after a while."

We tilted out of the room and the doctor followed us. "Are you going back home?" he asked.

"No," we said: "we'll wait outside in the car in case you want us for anything."

That night we stayed in the car. It was cold and foggy, and we ran the car heater until the gas gauge registered nearly empty. After that we just sat and shivered, each with his own thoughts. Conversation would have been superfluous.

The dawn was gray and ominous. The floor nurse, a short stout woman with much wrinkles along her eyes came out to the car.

"Hey, you folks are gonna freeze out here," she called: "come on into the kitchen and have some coffee. You can use the back door. No one'll ever know the difference."

"We think that cleaning coffee in his cup until it brewed, the nurse brought over the hot coffee to the little 'community' table and refilled our cups.

"Doctor's been up all night with that boy of yours," she said, "the man's just living on black coffee and cigarettes." She nodded her head vigorously. "He's a good man, that one. If anyone can do the trick, he can."

their first long dresses. Motherly Lilibet watched Margaret anxiously as they drove to the five-hour ordeal.

"I do hope she won't disgrace us all by falling asleep in the middle," Cawfie, Lilibet said to Miss Marion Crawford, their governess, who recalls the story in her book "The Little Princesses." When they got home Lilibet said:

"She was wonderful. Cawfie, I only had to nudge her once or twice when she played too loudly with the prayer books."

Lilibet joined the Girl Guides. She intensified her studies. The king began to have long talks with her on world politics.

The king and queen visited the United States and Canada in the spring of 1939. The girls stayed at home. It was in that year just before World War II started, that Lilibet met her husband and consort to be, Philip, at Dartmouth Royal Naval College after the return of the king and queen.

In September, after the royal family had gone to Scotland for the holidays, the war erupted. The king and queen hastened to London. The girls read the newspapers at bedtime and did Red Cross work.

They collected scrap iron. Lilibet washed pots and pans at a Girl Guides' camp.

The Germans started bombing, and they moved into the ancient fortress of Windsor Castle from the nearby lodge. The girls used to go down into a dungeon in their nightgowns when bombers approached.

Lilibet showed some romantic interest in a young officer of the guards, but she soon read of his engagement to be married. She joined the Auxiliary Territorial Service at Camberley and learned to take a car apart and drive trucks.

When the war ended, the girls drove into London. They stood with their parents on the Buckingham Palace balcony and, attended by two officers, joined the crowd outside. They joined heartily in the general knocking off of other people's hats.

Prince Philip was on active service in the Navy. They wrote each other constantly. Then his picture appeared on Lilibet's mantle. She began to wear grownup clothes. She had her own suite in Buckingham Palace and a car for her 21st birthday.

Philip came back and dined at the palace frequently with Lilibet and Margaret. They were now openly in love. In July of 1947 the engagement was announced. Philip took the family name of his uncle, Adm. Earl Mountbatten, and was naturalized as a British citizen.

"I'm so proud of her," Philip said to governess Crawford.

On Nov. 20, 1947, they were married at Westminster Abbey.

he found a .410-gauge shotgun.

Then he returned to a bedroom where his brother and sister were playing.

His attitude apparently frightened them, police said, and they tried to take refuge in a closet. Schulz, police said, cut them down in the doorway to the closet.

Both the brother and the sister had been shot four times, police said.

MOTHER WAS WASHING
Schulz' mother, meanwhile, was washing clothes at the kitchen sink.

Police said the youth went into the kitchen and killed her where she stood with three blasts from his shotgun.

"I started shooting—five, 10, 11 times," Milwaukee police said Schulz told the troopers in Kirkwood.

The youth dragged his mother's body into a bed room.

Schulz then took the keys to the family car and called a friend, Ralph Trede, also 18.

Ruinyon's injuries." However, after a conference with attorneys for sides, Judge Carr promised to rule on the motions on March 11, at 4 p. m. where ever he may be holding court at that time.

By its verdict the jury indicated it believed the contention of the plaintiffs that the construction company at work on a stretch of highway, which was also open to traffic, failed to properly warn motorists of expected construction hazards.

FIRST OF ITS KIND
Judge Carr said the case was the first to be heard in North Carolina involving a ruling on a construction company's responsibility to motorists in an area open to traffic. Several others, due to be heard here on the outcome of the Harnett suit.

Mrs. Karpf and Runyon were hit by the Nobler car as they stood beside the highway near Godwin after Runyon had stopped to offer Mrs. Karpf assistance in getting her car out of the ditch. Nobler testified that his car went into a spin in the same stretch of highway which had earlier ditched Mrs. Karpf and that it was out of control for some distance before striking Mrs. Karpf and Runyon.

Mrs. Karpf, who was hospitalized two months in the Dunn Hospital and still walks with a cane, suffered a broken leg, broken pelvic bone, ruptured abdomen and back injuries. Runyon suffered a punctured lung, a broken collar bone and shoulder injury.

In arguments to the jury, counsel for Mrs. Karpf contended that the accident had made it impossible for her to bear children. However, no medical opinion to that effect was introduced in evidence.

Nobler thanked each of the jurors following the verdict. The Long Island defendant, who is a postal employee, was on his way south with his wife to celebrate their 25th wedding anniversary when the accident occurred last year.

hearing and were bound over to the March term of U. S. District Court at Fayetteville.

Bond for Parker was set at $750 and bond for McNeill was set at $500.

ARRESTED AFTER RAID
Arrest of the three men followed a raid on a still Friday morning at 5 o'clock about 400 yards west of the "Blue Light," a Negro "juke joint" in Black River Township in Cumberland County.

Officers destroyed four 30-caliber submarine-type stills, including three which had just been run and one new outfit which had just been brought into the vicinity.

Parker and McNeill were stopped by officers while operating a pick-up truck allegedly loaded with 9 one-half gallons of non-tax-paid whiskey. The truck was confiscated by the government men.

The raid came after several days of extensive investigation. Participating officers included men from the Cumberland ABC unit, Federal ATU agents and Moore County ABC officers. The three defendants were charged with setting up and operating an illicit still.

three times on her face and arms and apparently died from loss of blood. She ran out of her home and fell in the middle of the road to die.

Sheriff Bill Salmon told the coroner that Sanders and his wife had been separated and his wife was living with her mother. He had been ordered to stay away from the place. About a week ago he was tried in the county recorder's court for non-support.

Testimony at the inquest disclosed that Sanders had gone to take groceries to the family. He put the groceries down beside the road and started into the house. His mother-in-law met him and admonished. "You know you're not supposed to come in this yard."

She had sent children for the groceries, but he refused to give them to anybody but his wife.

Sanders replied, "Nobody can keep me away. I'll go where I damn please."

The witnesses said the old woman, her daughter and the little girl picked up sticks and started throwing them at him and ordered him to leave.

WITNESSES

At that point, the evidence showed, Sanders whipped out the knife and started slashing everybody in sight.

Among witnesses testifying were Oscar Smith and his wife, who described the cutting, and Luther Randolph McNeill, a young boy who was present.

Members of the coroner's jury were: James E. Lee, B. J. McIndoo, Owen C. Tally, Bill Tew, H. C. Strickland and Jack Jackson.

Sanders wife is in the Dunn Hospital in a serious condition. The young girl was given first aid at Good Hope Hospital in Erwin and then released.
