opened it contained what was called "the bank"—peppy cash in the amount of five hundred dollars.

The ribbon showed the club had taken in more than seven thousand dollars that night.

Clayton looked at Jimmy. "We've over seven hundred dollars short here, and the answer that I get from our partner, Mr. Nolan, is that the register jumps."

Clayton went to the windows, parted the curtains, then opened one creaking window.

Clayton gazed out on the early morning street. Nobody was to be seen. Durante picked up the cash register and threw it out the window.

During the first week at the Durante Club, Clayton decided to take Jim away from the piano and put him on the floor as a comedian.

And now Clayton coined the nickname for Durante of "Schnozzola," or "Schnozzola," or simply, "Schnozz."

Durante says, "Clayton would run out to the kitchen, pretend to look for me, and when he found me he would grab me by the back and

When Jimmy refused to permit Jeanne to continue her stage career, the disappointed young woman aspired to become his business advisor.

Nor did Jimmy Durante help matters by telling Jeanne little lies, saying that he was going to ask the Shuberts or the Albee theatrical managers to find work for her on the stage.

He also could not see that he was well on his own way to becoming a great entertainer.

Unknown to Jim, his wife became so unnerved and ill that she drank during her lonely nights at home.

"I'll tell you somethin', Lou," he said, "that damned register ain't never gonna jump no more!"

aging increased production in order to meet the goal set for 1952. Film strips to illustrate the processes described were shown and each phase was thoroughly discussed.

The meetings were arranged by County Agent C. R. Ammons, who had invited interested parties, including ginners, fertilizer dealers, bankers, production credit club and agricultural leaders to attend.
