and Democratic presidential hopefuls stepped up their drive in the New Hampshire political campaign to-day, assuring an unusually heavy vote in the nation's first primary election.

heavy vote in the nation's first primary election.

As the campaign entered the home stretch, political leaders showed as much interest in winning the state's legalized "straw poll" as in capturing delegates to the nominating conventions.

Candidates must win both a majority of the delegates and the popularity test to claim a clear-cut victory next Twesday.

NIF-AND-TUCK

Some political observers predicted a stand-off between Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower and Sen. Robert A. Taft, principals in the Republican race, as a result of the complicated ballot.

They said Eisenhower could win a majority of the delegates and lose the preferential contest. The same could apply to Taft.

Sen. Estes Kefauver, challenging President Truman's strength, and Republican Harold E. Stassen were the only candidates actually campaigning. Taft, however, is scheduled to begin an intensive three-day tour tomorrow. None lacked political ballyhoo.

Kefauver based his hopes on a street corner, hand-shaking campaign. He told the voters he was a "loyal Democrat, not opposing any particular candidate, but offering a platform to further world peace and romote economic and social provess at home."
