The real function of the Chamber is to accomplish these ends on a long term basis. No town just grows. Before the Chamber can "sell the town" it must examine the town for its advantages and shortcomings, and strive to have the citizens correct as many of the latter as possible, he declared.

It is to the South's advantage to strike a balance between agriculture and industry, but a lack of caution in this respect will lead to long term disadvantages. New industry must be encouraged, but the type encouraged must be keeping with the resources the area has to offer, not only in power facilities, but in labor supply, Daley said.

INDUSTRY EMPLOYMENT

It is very important that Benson attract an industry which will employ men, before it seeks further women payrolls. If we encourage further female payrolls at the present time, we are very likely to injure the labor supply of industry already established. We must find a labor outlet for the husbands and sons of our female workers if we hope to hold them in this area. To this end we shall seek small assembly plants and semi-skilled processing operations, he continued.

The one great danger, as I see it, to a solid industrial development in the South, is over-enthusiastic claims regarding labor supply. We have the manpower, he pointed out, it is as good as any in the country, but we must help it acquire industrial skills.

The southern farmer would be justifiably dubious of the prospects of a man fresh from the North, with no experience in farming, starting out to cultivate 100 acres of tobacco or cotton, Daley declared. The man in question might well be the most skilled mechanic in the world, but he would need experience in crops before he would be a good agricultural risk. In the same manner, the southern worker must expect to spend several years learning skilled trades before he is ready to become a part of skilled industry. We can understand the over-enthusiastic statements of some who seem to ignore this fact, but we feel that they must be tempered with a practical evaluation of facts. Industrial labor needs more than a willingness to work; it must develop industrial skills, he pointed out.

For that reason, we would approach the northern industrial leaders with the idea that the South has a labor reserve of intelligent, willing workers, and that the communities of the South will help train them for industrial utilization by putting shop classes in our high schools, sponsoring trade classes for adults, and encouraging mechanical skills in our youth. In that manner we can grow with the new industry, declared the speaker.

NEW BUSINESSES

It is the Chamber's task to attract business to the merchants. We feel that the business should be a steady flow, rather than periodic drives. The steady flow will enable the merchants to plan his merchandising and maintain a steady inventory, the speaker pointed out. The person with the vague idea that the Chamber should, somehow, improve the town, is correct. Anything which improves a community is good for commerce. I plan, over a long period, to have the Chamber lend its support to any religious, educational or cultural benefit, which would make Benson a better place to live and raise a family," Daley concluded.

Bible School

Attendance has been excellent among the approximately 100 enrolled at the Divine Street Methodist Church vacation Bible School, according to Mrs. H. C. Turlington, who is directing.

Here the beginners are being taught by Mrs. Floyd Middlebrook and Mrs. Everette Dofferyre assisted by Ann Bassford and Alice Stewart. They are studying "The World About Us" by Lucy D. Bickel.

Primary classes are under the direction of Mrs. Ed Hood and Mrs. James Snipes, assisted by Renee Ford and Jean Scirell. They are using "Working With God In His World" by Margaret S. Ward as their textbook.

Juniors and intermediates are studying under Bernard Petty, assisted by Alice Prince, Virginia Turlington and Joyce Godwin. A special nursery group of four-year-olds is being taught by Mrs. George Franklin Blalock, assisted by Janice Fowler.

PRESBYTERIAN SCHOOL
