

Now People Can Rest, But Queen's Work Must Go On

(This is the final dispatch on coronation week by the son of British Prime minister Sir Winston Churchill.)

LONDON (U.P.) — Most people impatiently concerned in the work of the coronation can now relax and have a rest. Not so the queen. For her the ceremony was only the start of one of the busiest months of her life.

Yesterday morning at Buckingham Palace she was presenting medals to overseas contingents from the commonwealth. Yesterday afternoon she drove through the streets of northeast London with the Duke of Edinburgh and last night she gave a great state banquet at Buckingham Palace for all the commonwealth ministers and heads of foreign delegations.

Her engagement book is studded with five or six important and exciting engagements each day right to the end of July. "I do sympathize with you ma'am in all the anxieties you have at this time," "Yes," she replied, half in earnest, half jokingly, "I can hardly get a wink of sleep at night; I'm so excited about the Derby."

DERBY IS SATURDAY

The Derby is to be run Saturday and the queen's horse, Aureole, is thought to have a very good chance of winning. The coronation was part of the queen's work which she does superbly well and evidently enjoys. But racing is far away her most important diversion and in the last year or so she has acquired a very considerable knowledge of horse breeding. It would be a wonderful climax to coronation week if the queen's horse should win on Saturday.

The earl Marshal, the Duke of Norfolk, whom everyone is praising for his tireless efficiency, which was so well vindicated on coronation day, took a day off yesterday and spent it in the way he likes most — watching a cricket match at Hove between Sussex and the Australians. Among his many and varied positions, which range from being chief butler to the queen to chairman of the Sussex County council finance committee, the Duke is president of the Sussex Country Cricket Club.

Apart from taking all the main decisions in the organization of the coronation, the Duke of Norfolk personally conducted all the rehearsals. It was a splendid sight to see him in a black morning coat with his earl marshal's baton in one hand and a hand microphone in the other walking with measured step in the choir of the Abbey, pausing every now and then to haul the long lead up behind him. He always spoke in calm and level tones "a little more to the right, archbishop," "please bring the crown Mr. Dean," "no, that's the wrong crown, please bring the right one."

It has been reported how the fanfare of trumpets which greeted the queen on her arrival at the abbey was immediately followed by the entrance, from the four corners of the theatre where the crowning was to be done, of four housemaids in white coats who brushed away, with their besoms and brooms, with frantic intensity for a couple of minutes, and then retreated to the posts or comfort stations from which they had emerged.

CAREFULLY REHEARSED

The congregation roared with laughter at this comical and, as they must have supposed, unrehearsed anti-climax. In fact, the activities of the four housemaids had been as carefully rehearsed and timed as the entrance of the queen herself. One of the things which has impressed foreign visitors to London has been the dignity of the crowds. Though they had waited all night before coronation and were soaked to the bone, they cheered with immense enthusiasm, but there was never a trace of that hysteria which usually overcomes great crowds in other countries on occasions of this sort. As one American put it to me, they realized they were in the presence of history.

Sue RALEIGH, N. C. (U.P.) — The father of North Carolina State College student Richard P. Denise, of Goldsboro, N. C., made it clear in city court here yesterday that he can't afford $50 date for him. Denise plead guilty to trespass in a party raid on Meredith College and was fined $50 and costs. The father asked the judge if his son would be guilty of trespassing if he dated a girl at Meredith. The judge said he would not if he behaved. "It might sound like a stupid question to you, but I can't afford $50 a date for him," the father explained.
