ACT IS QUESTIONED
Douglas granted the stay on grounds there is a question whether the Rosenbergs should have been sentenced under the 1946 Atomic Energy Act instead of the 1917 espionage law, under which they were convicted and sentenced to die.

Stern said the contention that the Atomic Energy Act superseded the 1917 espionage act does "not have substantiality." He argued that the Rosenbergs' co-conspirator, Morton Sobell, attempted to get information generally for the aid of the Soviet Union and not just about atomic energy.

The ultimate goal of all concerned including the Banks, The College and the Agricultural Agencies is to improve the standard of living of our people and to improve the economy by developing programs that will meet the needs of our farm women and men more adequately.

"Julius Rosenberg was trying to recruit scientists in a position to get useful information but not just atomic information," Stern said.

"If the latter act does supersede," Douglas asked, "the sentence would be vacated and they would go back for resentencing, wouldn't they?"

"Yes," Stern replied.
