United Press Sports Writer

NEW YORK (P) - Sports are designed for happy moments but they have their sad ones, too, and the past week brought more than its share of sorrow to the sports world.

Four of the men who dedicated their lives to athletics took the long count within a span of almost that many days. Two of them, Dan Morgan and Jerry Hoyt, made the headlines and the other two, Arch Ward and Harold Burr, wrote them.

They'll be missed, along with the unusually large number of others who preceded them this year.

"Dum Dan" Morgan may be the best known of them because he was around the longest and spoke more words, probably, than all the rest of them put together,. His nickname was one of those characteristic misnomers of the fight game because the glib little octogenarian could talk faster than his horses ever ran and better than any of his fighters ever fought.

Hoyt Had "Class"

Hoyt was only 26, a race driver with a brilliant future as auto racing futures go. As they say in the pits, he had "class," until he wrapped his car around him at Oklahoma City the other day.

Ward was one of the best known sports editors in the country. I was his imagination which produced the All-Star baseball and football games which annually are highlights of the year. When he died of a heart ailment at 56

the Chicago Tribune wasn't the only loser.

Burr, who succumbed at 71, still outlasted his paper.

That was the now defunct Brooklyn Eagle, for which he was a leading baseball authority. As he explained just recently, "Seeing the Eagle go took something out of me."
The names of those four greatly lengthened the tragic list for 1955. Already it included such names as those of Harry Agganis of the Boston Red Sox, former lightweight champion Ad Wolgast, writer Hy Turkin, speedboat driver Lloyd Maddock and race drivers Bill Vukovich, Mannie Ayulo, Mike Nazaruk and Larry Crockett.

Auto Racing Tragedies

Auto racing is having one of is worst years. Nazaaruk and Crockett were killed at Langhorne, Pa.; Ayulo in a practice run for the Indianapolis 500 and Vukovich during the running of that race — a day after receiving a let-ter from his daughter telling him to "put your foot through it, daddy, I need some new dresses Wolgast long had been a patient in a mental hospital. The man who won the lightweighgt crown from Battling Nelson succumber at 67.

One of the most sudden tragedies of the year was the death of Agganis, the "Golden Greek" of football fame who had been a rising young star with the Boston Red Sox. Only 25, Agganis died of a pulmonary embolism while apparently recovering from a chest ailment.

Turkin, of the New York Daily News, was the author of the "Encyclopedia of Baseball." Maddock was killed in a regatta at Detroit and racing had another fatality when Margaret Pritchard, a woman driver, was killed a San Di-

Some were more noted than others, but all of them will be missed.
