

Some Notes On The $64,000 Question

NEW YORK (AP) — Random notes on "The $64,000 Question" after watching it on-the-spot.

The convertible, a pale blue job, that's wheeled on stage during the show isn't the same one that's given to contestants as a consolation prize. It's a number that has been specially rubbed in the camera eye. The sponsor says it costs $900 along each week to move the convertible in and out, pay the various union crews that must handle it, wash and polish it and drain it of all gas and fumes. The first department checks the last process. The chauffeur who sits behind the wheel of the car actually isn't driving it at all—the convertible is pushed on stage by four brawny crewmen who remain out of camera range.

LONG WAITING RANGE
The studio from which "The $64,000 Question" originates seats about 850 persons. At the present time, there's about a one-month's wait for the "ducat." It ranks fifth in demand at CBS-TV - After Arthur Godfrey, Ed Sullivan, Jackie Gleason and Herb Shriner.

Close friends and relatives of contestants are placed in center row seats downstairs so the camera can zero in while contestants are deliberating. The contestants themselves are seated in front, downstairs at the beginning of the program when they're on camera, then slipped backstage while the first commercial is running. Lynn Dollar is the name of the blonde who escorts contestants into the isolation booth. She's an ac-press and model and has been using the moniker for about three years.

Ben Feit, the bank vice-president who unlocks the big questions, has a stand-in-another bank official named James Agnew. Feit, incidentally, has four fan clubs - in Los Angeles, Miami, Boston and Denver.

THREE BANK GUARDS
The bank guards who flank Feit are George Etique, George Sullivan and Jim Corcoran. Etique is a regular; the other two alternate. Hal March, the emcee, occupies a tiny dressing room on the first floor. It's the noisiest spot in the joint since it's right off the only water fountain.

Before the studio audience files in, March and a couple of production assistants do a screwball spoof of the show in the dry run before the cameras. Sample question: "Who is the manager of the Milan Opera House?" Answer: "Bartolomeo Casey Stengel."

Perhaps the strangest part about the show is that the man who cooked it up, Louis Cowan, never sticks around to watch it in the studio. Like $0 million other Americans, Cowan sweats it out before a TV set at home.

IS DECISION NEAR?—Duty called Princess Margaret from her romance with RAF Group Capt. Peter Townsend to a state dinner with the Queen and the heads of the Church of England. The dinner for the Royal family gives the outspoken Archbishop of Canterbury an opportunity to deliver his verdict on whether the Church will use all of its power to block a wedding between the Princess and the divorced commoner. Above, Margaret is shown with the Archbishop of Canterbury, Dr. Geoffrey Fisher, during an official visit to Canterbury in 1950.

Duke Of Windsor Might Have Answer

By GLORIA SWANSON
Written for United Press

LONDON (AP) — If Princess Margaret's Uncle David, better known as the Duke of Windsor, were to write to his niece regarding her present situation—what would be his advice?

I can't help toying with the idea, Uncle David is the only qualified member of the royal family whose advice would not be theoretical, since he has a measuring stick of experience to judge the joys of living like "other people."

It is not at all unlikely that such a letter would contain great wisdom, gathered during 19 years of living as a former king among the commoners.

Would he tell Margaret that the privileges of royalty are not as great as the freedom of the average man? Or would he, say this life of the average man is a rugged road and if, if not born to it, one can find oneself a displaced person? Might he say that all difficulties can be compensated by great love?

I wonder if he would tell her that, if he had it all to do again, he would make the same decision? On the other hand, he might say that if the group captain and the princess set aside their love for the laws of the church and the good of the crown, it might have a better chance to endure. This way it would probably go down in history as a great love story. He might write Margaret that she is too young to realize that the one who has the least to sacrifice has a greater responsibility. In the case of Peter Townsend, who is not only a man but one of some years, think how he could prove his love, his character and integrity by insisting that this young princess should not make these great sacrifices for him.

Because of that old cliché "time will tell," as it has an unrelenting way of doing, Uncle David might remind Margaret that should the marriage turn out to be an unhappy one, there could be no divorce, nor playing the role of the "innocent party."

While I am speculating, I might as well go the whole hog and wonder what "Wally" of Windsor would be able to offer Townsend in the way of good advice. For example, how to make the person who has sacrificed for love happy.

Teacher Rout Eight Hoodlums

NEW YORK (AP) — A lone woman teacher routed eight beer-drinking hoodlums who invaded a junior high school on Manhattan's Lower East Side yesterday.

The youths, all well over six feet tall, wearing black leather jackets and dungarees, entered the school yesterday afternoon guzzling beer and munching on sandwiches as they swaggered through the corridors.

They scrawled on the walls and molested several teen-aged girls. A 13-year-old girl accosted by the gang ran screaming upstairs to the principal's office.

Mrs. Anna Phillips, acting assistant principal, confronted the gang and ordered them to leave. When they refused she slapped the two smallest six-footers and the gang ran out.
