Who Else But Mr. Nixon?

The fact that President Eisenhower didn't say at his press conference last week that he wanted Richard Nixon as his running mate should be the Republican presidential nominee has led some to the belief that the President may want somebody other than Mr. Nixon.

The President may want somebody else, but his failure to express a preference for Mr. Nixon at his press conference scarcely is in itself sufficient indication of that.

His press conference remark does not commit him to Mr. Nixon nor does it commit him to anybody else.

There is no reason at all to believe that Mr. Eisenhower wants someone other than Mr. Nixon as his running mate.

With the high regard that the President has for Mr. Nixon it is unlikely that he would be a party to any movement to replace him as Vice President.

And even if he should be persuaded to be satisfied with some other candidate, who is there who could beat Mr. Nixon if the convention were left free to make its own choice unencumbered by an Eisenhower preference?

Mr. Nixon is a great favorite in the Republican party and has considerable power in his own right.

New Farm Bill Slated To Reach Vote Thursday

WASHINGTON (AP) — The farm bill on which the Senate begins voting Thursday is a 49-page hodge-podge of proposed new laws dealing with subjects ranging from price supports to ships.

Most debate has centered on controversial sections restoring rigid, 90 percent of parity price supports for corn, cotton, peanuts and millable wheat.

The bill also includes the administration's much-discussed $1.1 billion soil bank plan, providing payments to farmers who take surplus-producing fields out of production.

Most other features of the "package bill" have been overshadowed by the hotly-contested price support battle. Here is a summary of the measure:

Price supports—restores 90 percent of "fair earning power" props for 1956-57 on cotton, corn, milling quality wheat, peanuts and rice. The 90 percent support for rice would apply only to portions of the crop consumed in the United States, its possessions and Cuba.

The bill would also raise supports on manufacturing milk about 10 cents per hundredweight, and direct the secretary of agriculture to keep soybean and cottonseed supports at a level that would allow the two products to compete fairly in the home market.

WOULD RESTORE FORMULA

Another provision would restore the use of an old parity formula for wheat and several other crops, resulting in increased support levels.

Soil bank — An acreage reserve program providing payments to growers of wheat, cotton, corn, rice, and tobacco who cut plantings below their acreage allotments. A conservation reserve program providing conservation aid and rental payments to farmers who put other cropland to "rest" under conservation plans.

Surplus disposal—the Agricultural Department would be authorized to add 250 million bushels of corn to a "set-aside," ignoring that stock in calculating price support levels.

The bill would add 250 million dollars annually to the sums authorized for farm crops. It would be authorized for disposing of surplus peal a requirement that at least half the farm surpluses exported in return for foreign currencies be used to authorize Benson to hire a surplus disposal administrator at $15,000 annually, and require states to pay part of the cost of certain disaster relief programs.

Marketing quotas and acreage allotments — "commercial" wheat area, in which controls are in force, would be reduced. Cotton price supports would be lowered by basing supports on average grades instead of 7-8 inch fiber. A national cotton acreage reserve would be set aside within the national acreage allotment, to be used for increasing small farm allotments. Growers who planted below their allotments or who controlled crops would be permitted to count the under-planted acreage in their planting "history."

U.S. Protection of Food Passes 50-Year Mark

BY PETER EDSON NEA Washington Correspondent

WASHINGTON (NEA)—How about a very little bit of formaldehyde in your milk today? Just enough to kill the bacteria and "keep" the milk longer.

Or how about eating foods that have been "preserved" by new atomic energy radiation processes? They'll kill the germs and make the foods stay fresh longer.

The only catch is that eating too much, too often might be harmful. It takes years of testing on laboratory animals to know what's safe.

In the last 20 years, says Food and Drug Commissioner George P. Larrick, hundreds of new chemicals have been added to foods. These additives are intended to "improve" the foods by coloring, flavoring, neutralizing, sweetening or emulsifying—to mention a few of the legitimate uses.

The hypothetical examples given above are just two of the problems the U.S. Food and Drug Administration is faced with in this, its 50th anniversary year of operations.

THE BUSINESS of trying to chisel away at the pure food laws and their enforcement is in itself 50 years old.

A House interstate Commerce Subcommittee under Chairman J. Percy Priest (D-Tenn) is just completing hearings on this session's crop of 10 proposed pure food law amendments.

Among this year's proposals is one which would reverse the present strict prevention against the use of poisons in food. The amendment would exempt amounts of poison considered safe for human consumption.

FDA Commissioner Larrick's answer to this one—as in the case of formaldehyde in milk—is that as long as we have present pasteurization and sterilization, poison isn't needed.

ANOTHER PROPOSED amendment would require the government to prove food additives harmful before they could be banned. This is sometimes difficult. The government thinks all additives should be proved harmless. All too often, new chemicals have been introduced before complete scientific tests of their safety have been made.

Under another amendment, the government would be reduced to 60-90 days for making a determination on a new product. FDA officials think 120-180 days, or even longer, are necessary for adequate testing.

THE PRIZE OF THE LOT is a proposal by Rep. Joseph Patrick O'Hara (R-Minn). It would transfer to the courts for trial any case in which FDA scientists came up with a finding unfavorable to a food processor on any of his products.

Chief Judge John Biggs, Jr., of the U.S. Third Circuit Court of Appeals, Wilmington, Del., told the Priest committee that the already overburdened federal courts should not be saddled with technical cases of this kind. He declared it would be the opening wedge for destroying the Administrative Procedures Act under which all government regulatory agencies now operate.

Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare Maxion B. Folsom, under which FDA operates, has given Congress recommendations against passage of many of these amendments. He has also proposed other amendments for strengthening the law.

In one of his proposals, food processors would be required to pay the costs of government scientific research to prove new products safe for human consumption.

GOT EVEN WITH HER Slaying Confessed By Jilted Lover

Police said Walter Tips, a machine and tool grinder, broke down after being questioned all night.

Police quoted Tips as saying he had planned "to get even with her for some time . . . She had it coming to her . . . But I didn't intend to kill her, only scare her."

Miss Broderick, who was reported to have recently turned down a proposal of marriage from Tips, was struck by both blasts from the shotgun. One struck her left shoulder and the other ripped through the back of her head.

Tips was arrested a short time later at his home, not far from the Broderick residence. A double-barreled shotgun was found in a closet.

DENIED IT AT FIRST The suspect at first insisted he was innocent and did not change his story when police took him to the morgue to view Miss Broderick's body.

But several hours later he confessed. He said he was afraid of losing Miss Broderick as she refused several recent date attempts.

Invocation will be by Roger Johnson, principal of Lillington High School. Joe Curria, chairman of the Angier school board, will give a welcome. Dr. Childs is to be introduced by County Superintendent of Schools Chem Profit.
