Mr. DeMille And History

Recognition of historical research into the life of Moses -for which Cecil B. DeMille spent a quarter of a million dollars - in the making of a new motion picture version of "The Ten Commandments" suggests that the often maligned movie "spectacle" has made a contribution to scholarship of considerable importance.

The decision of the University of Southern California Press to publish in book form research conducted at Mr. DeMille's commission is an indication of the historical importance of material concerning the 30 years of Moses' life which is not mentioned in the Bible. It may serve to emphasize the contributions movies, plays, novels, and other art forms have made to publc knowledge of history. Because history sometimes has been abused by those who operate in these media, there is a tendency to dismiss all such ventures as unworthy, In truth, some extremely painstaking and very valuable historical research has been done in the interests of writing fiction and for the various entertainment media. Public knowledge of many periods and areas in history is far wider for these efforts. Only occasionally is the information thus supplied unreliable.

Recognition of the effort Mr. DeMille has made in this latest of his pictures comes as a fitting reward to a man who has been concerned with making the most of opportunities offered by a popular entertainment medium to widen the general sphere of knowledge. The importance of this research undoubtedly will outlast the motion picture for which it was done.

This is no new phenomenon. Popular art forms, which may be scorned by contemporary intellectuals, often have inspired distinguished achievement to which succeeding generations have acknowledged a debt.

Thus, Cecil B. DeMille's motion pictures may be best known today for such spectacular scenes as the Queen of Sheba taking a bath in milk. Their contributions both to out the brotherhood in the youth popular knowledge and to scholarship will, in the long campus and conferences in Washrun, considerably exceed this vivid impression of today. ington.
