It's a Slow, Primitive, But Very Deadly War
BY RAY CROMLEY
Washington Correspondent
Newspaper Enterprise Assn.

WASHINGTON—(NEA)—The Special Forces captain and I were out in a small motor boat in the middle of the Mekong River in South Viet Nam just east of the Cambodian border. He pointed to the river bank on our left. "Viet Cong forces are all along there," he said. He pointed a little ahead on our right. "The Viet Cong are also there," he added.

I DIDN'T SEE ANY VIET CONG or hear any shots. I still have no way of knowing whether any Viet Cong were patrolling at the moment. That is the eerie part of this war. You don't see the enemy.

For all I could tell, I was as safe as I would be along a country river at home in the United States. Or I could have been in the sights of a Viet Cong rifle. Officers assured me I'd already been. I have no way of knowing whether that was the case.

"You see that little imitation houseboat over there?" asked the captain. "And that small landing craft. We have a recoilless rifle and a machine gun mounted on the houseboat and troops loaded on the landing craft. We have them slowly patrolling that side of the river close to shore—so inconspicuously that no one notices them."

"Then we take the motor boat we're in right now and run up and down openly on this side of the river. We're bait, you see. Then the Viet Cong attack and we duck and run. The houseboat and the landing craft push over fast from the opposite shore and attack the Viet Cong who have exposed themselves. If we're fast enough, we maul them a little."

THE CAPTAIN'S SPECIAL FORCES OUTPOST has the job of defending a 20-mile section of the Vietnamese border against infiltration of Viet Cong troops from sanctuaries in Cambodia. Because the land is so marshy, his men do their patrolling in boats.

This Special Forces advanced detachment of 12 American officers and men had trained several companies (exact number secret) of native Vietnamese into special guerrilla detachments to constantly patrol their 20 miles of border area.

They were working day and night. But they don't have enough men to do a complete job. It was clear the Viet Cong were moving out of their Cambodian sanctuary, making attacks in Viet Nam, then moving back into safety in Cambodia. There they rest, regroup, retrain and train.

This Special Forces outpost reminded me of an old Army stockade in the West during the Indian fighting days. There was a wall around a small compound with machine gun emplacements every so often. There was a watch tower in the center with a 75 mm recoilless rifle and a machine gun mounted to fire over the walls.

This Special Forces detachment was a sitting duck for Viet Cong to sit outside and fire in with well-aimed mortar fire.

"In fact," one officer told me, "you see this group of 100 or so Vietnamese lined up outside the compound for free medical care. Well, we know some of them are Viet Cong. When they come in, they carefully pace off the distance. Then, later, their mortar men know the exact range to set their weapons."
