Post Shows Potential

Garland Atkins and the General Publishing Company of Belmont, North Carolina. Johnson was hired by Atkins as manager and then editor of the Post in 1971.

Johnson's impatience with the paper's progress and his desire to see the Post become a "first-class black-oriented newspaper led him to purchase the business from Atkins and the General Publishing Company in June of 1974.

Johnson said at the time of the purchase, "The Charlotte black community needs a voice that mirrors the opinions of that community. We want the Post to provide services which the daily papers do not offer. These services to the black community will include information, education, and entertainment. We hope that the CHARLOTTE POST will be able to influence in a positive way community life."

A few months later the Tross family sold the paper to

Dr. Nathaniel Tross. Created in 1877 as a church news newspaper called the MESSANGER, the paper was re-named THE CHARLOTTE POST and transformed into a general black-oriented weekly publication in 1918. The brainchild behind this change in Charlotte's only black newspaper was A.M. Houston, a black civic leader and commercial printer with offices on Second Street.

For many years Houston guided the Post until declining health forced him to hand the management of the business to his son. Some time later the Post was purchased by Dr. Nathaniel Tross, a prominent black minister, who published the paper until his death in March of 1971.

Johnson said at the time of the purchase, "The Charlotte black community needs a voice that mirrors the opinions of that community. We want the Post to provide services which the daily papers do not offer. These services to the black community will include information, education, and entertainment. We hope that the CHARLOTTE POST will be able to influence in a positive way community life."
