Modern Dentistry

Quite frequently a patient will come in and say, "Doctor, I want this tooth 'pulled' as it is broken down, irritates my tongue, as you can see, it looks very bad." When a patient who has reached such a conclusion finds out that modern dentistry can often rebuild a tooth, to the point of being functional and esthetically very acceptable, he or she is usually quite elated, and rightly so. It's always good news to find that a natural tooth can be saved!

First, the tooth in question has to be rebuilt and prepared (shaped) to accept a crown, sometimes called a cap. There are many types of crowns available, 1) plastic 2) porcelain jackets, 3) gold crowns, 4) veneer crowns, 5) porcelain fused to gold crowns, and 6) non-precious metal crowns. There are also outdated types called swaged crowns.

The plastic crown is usually the least expensive. However, while initially it has a good appearance, it may discolor and lose its esthetic appeal, and it may have a tendency to wear.

The porcelain jacket is probably the most esthetic replacement possible, but this too has its drawbacks; they are quite fragile. Cast gold crowns last quite long. The property of gold alloys, and the attendant technology, allows a precise fit on the tooth, which is important since a poor margin will lead to leakage and decay. Some patients don't want gold showing, so gold veneer crowns were developed, and these mask the gold from view. However, eventually even the veneers wear somewhere in a 5-10 year period.

Some 30 years back the technology for successful porcelain to gold-platinum alloy crowns was developed, giving the esthetic qualities of tooth enamel plus total tolerance to the oral cavity, with adequate strength. And today, there is the porcelain-fused gold alloy crown; it lasts longest, has excellent marginal fit, remains esthetically acceptable and rarely fractures. These, of course, are more expensive.

In process of development is porcelain fused to non-precious metal crowns and bridges, but at present the results have not proved as reliable as with porcelain fused to gold.

Given the opportunity, your dentist will be pleased to give you the reasoning behind what is best in your individual case.
