

"Diary Of Anne

Frank" Is Little

Theatre Play

For a powerful and unforgettable evening of theatre don't miss the Little Theatre's production of THE DIARY OF ANNE FRANK, opening on Wednesday, January 30.

This timeless story is a dramatization of an actual diary written by a young Jewish girl while hiding from the Nazis during World War II. This moving and often tenderly amusing show is under the compassionate artistic direction of Eugene Kusterer. The innovative and complicated set is by technical director James Eric.

Karen Smith will star as the plucky Anne, whose writing has become an important testament to human dignity. Jerry Moore and Dottie Tobias will play her indomitable and patient parents.

This remarkable story is not just a tale of war-time misery. It is an exciting, uplifting story of a girl who refused to be robbed of the adventure of adolescence. All of life is in hiding with Anne, her family and friends: courage, boredom, generosity, terror, joy, anger, love.

This is one of the finest plays you are likely to see...a touching, heart-warming and ultimately heart-breaking story, beautifully told. "The Diary of Anne Frank" runs Wednesday through Sunday January 30 through February 17, curtain 8:15- excepting a 2:30 matinee on Sunday February 10.

With "The Intriguing Eyes?"

By Teresa Burns
Post Staff Writer

Who is this handsome man with the intriguing eyes? He's none other than Jet Brown, the singer for the hit "Ain't that Enough For You."

And if you're into disco you'll definitely be into Jet Brown.

Born in Philadelphia, November 15, 1953, Brown began his musical career at the age of seven. He studied piano and theory at the Settlement Music School for five years. After that he furthered his musical foundations with private instructions until the age of sixteen. During this time, Brown was one who aided local church activities, and sought harmony between gang members and community groups.

At the age of eighteen, Brown was writing his own material and performing locally with a band he formed called Footloose.

From this point Brown formed another quartet and began operating through the strain of the Black musical gift to America - jazz.

When John Davis heard the voice of Brown he knew this was the singer for his latest project, The Monster Orchestra. You could say Brown is the protege of Davis. Whatever the case, the combination sung their way into the hearts of the delicate disco dimension of America.

Affiliation with hits like "Be Thankful For What You Got" and "I Just Can't Say Goodbye," and made John Davis one of the most admired producers of disco-oriented music. He and The Monster Orchestra have tunes ranging from "The Magic Is You," to "Up Jumped The Devil." Davis has managed to write, produce or arrange for such greats as Ashford and Simpson, Lou Rawls, The O'Jays, Johnny Mathis, The Stylistics, John Travolta, Diana Ross and many more.

Davis has already made a name for himself and it remains to be seen whether Jet Brown will stick with him or venture out on his own.
