DENTAL HINTS

In these days of outlandishly high malpractice suit settlements, is it logical to think any doctor would place himself purposely in a questionable position?

2nd & 3rd opinions by other doctors can be beneficial - often are recommended by your own doctor - but beware of conducting a fee-bidding campaign, unless you seek simply the lowest fee without regard for anything else.

We must assume the majority of professionals function legitimately, as does the majority of any large business group. So, if you approach each doctor with the attitude that he is probably a crook of some kind, you prevent the development of an-unstrained cooperation doctor-patient relationship, so necessary to the ultimate success of your treatment. It is difficult, if not impossible, to wholeheartedly follow the directions of someone in whom you have not placed your trust!

Above all it should be remembered, that your doctor's practice is his business, his livelihood. He wants his treatment of you to be successful...he wants you to be pleased and satisfied as this builds a good and constant practice. Logical?
