In Mexico JCSU Students To Attend 10th National Symposium

Eleven Johnson C. Smith University students will participate in the tenth annual National Symposium for minority biomedical researchers to be held in Albuquerque, New Mexico, April 3-5.

The symposium, sponsored by the Division of Research Resources, National Institutes of Health and the University of New Mexico School of Medicine, is by far the largest scientific gathering involving minorities in the United States.

The students, majoring in biology, chemistry, mathematics or computer science, are participants in the Minority Biomedical Research Program of the Minority Access to Research Careers Program at JCSU. Both programs are to encourage more minority interest in scientific research.

The three MARC students who will present scientific research papers at the conference are: Stephanie McLeod, Perry Solice and Sheila Walls.

Eight MBS students to attend the conference are Diane Watkins, Robin Hayes, Angela Grice, Robin Williams, James Coaxum, Detra Henry, Celeste Knox and Toni Moore.

"The annual meeting provides a forum for students to present and exchange information about research projects in which they have participated," said Dr. Roselyn Little, JCSU program director of MBS.

Little said the symposium will also allow students the opportunity to seek out and identify with role models who are accomplished scientists.

Along with Dr. Little five other faculty persons are to attend the symposium. They are: Dr. B. K. Chopra, Dr. Hampton Wright, Dr. Rowe-Anderson, Dr. Appavoo Perumal and Mr. George Henry.
