The North Carolina School of Science and Mathematics (NCSSM) is now seeking 150 NC tenth graders for admission in September 1983.

The school is now accepting nominations of those who have special interest and ability in the two areas and who wish to spend the 11th and 12th grade years in a residential school. The campus is located in Durham with easy access to the science resources in the Research Triangle.

Admission materials have been sent to every public and non-public high school in the state and to a number of individuals and groups statewide. If you are interested in applying, talk with your counselor.

An informal survey conducted last spring by Robert Poole, director of Development at North Carolina Central University Office of Development revealed that the most pressing need at the university can be summed up in one word - scholarships.

Scholarships were what the department heads, administrators and faculty members stressed as being high priority from the university's fundraising program.

"Scholarships to attract more majors," was one reason given by the physics department.
