Stephanie Harris Wins Hagemeyer Award

Stephanie Harris went to work in the Cosmetology Department at Belk Department Stores when she finished high school.

She's taken cosmetology courses in high school and was plagued with doubts that she didn't have what it took to succeed in college.

Today, she's a partner in the Charlotte law firm of Miller and Harris, is a part-time law instructor at Central Piedmont Community College, and is the winner of the 1984 Richard H. Hagemeyer Education Advancement Award.

Stephanie's life turned around, she said, when she decided to take a few courses at CPCC.

"With the guidance of involved and caring teachers at CPCC, I discovered that the motivation to learn and prosper must come from within yourself," Stephanie said.

The Hagemeyer Award, named for CPCC's president, is given by the college each year to the student or former student who has benefited significantly from studying at CPCC and who has made real contributions to the community as a result.

Stephanie did so well in her studies at CPCC that she gained the confidence to attend UNCC. After earning her degree in political science, she went to the University of Tennessee College of Law, graduating in 1983.

She will receive a plaque and $600 as this year's winner.

Runners-up this year were Sally Naylor of Charlotte, a CPCC graphics arts lab instructor, and Lincolnton attorney John Lafferty.

School Violence? There Is More To It Than Meets The Eye!

Special To The Post
"School violence. There's more to it than meets the eye." That is the message of the National School Safety Center," announced George Nicholson, the Center's Director and Chief Counsel, as America's children return to school throughout the country.
The Center, a partnership of the U.S. Departments of Justice and Education with California's Pepperdine University, is funded by a $3.95 million, two-year federal grant to promote school safety and student attendance in all 50 states and the District of Columbia.

"The Center is the national headquarters of America's new systematic effort to coalesce public, private and academic resources to help reduce campus crime and violence, and encourage a positive educational climate. It also provides a central clearinghouse on school safety and student attendance information and programs for educators, lawyers, judges, law enforcers and the public," added Nicholson.

"The Center will promote inter-agency cooperation and networking; file amicus curiae (friend of the court) briefs in carefully selected cases in state and federal appeals courts; conduct legal and legislative research; sponsor training conferences; prepare and distribute publications and multimedia resources; and conduct a nationwide public service advertising campaign called National School Watch," declared Nicholson.

"One of the Center's most effective communications tools is "School Safety," which is a news journal published three times each school year and distributed to 80,000 lawyers, judges, law enforcers, and other key state and national leaders," asserted Nicholson.
"The cover of the premiere issue of "School Safety," published to coincide with the beginning of this school year," said Nicholson,

"displays Norman Rockwell's famous painting, 'The Shiner,' which depicts a school girl sporting a black eye as she waits outside the principal's office. The same painting, includes the Center's message, 'School violence. There's more to it than meets the eye.' is to be the key theme in National School Watch."
