

Is "Politics" A Dirty Word Here?

At some times, in some places, for some people, "politics" is almost a dirty word, and politicians have a hard row to hoe to convince their constituents that they can and will work for the people.

What do Charlotteans think of politics? And how do today's young people view politicians? Post reporter Audrey Lodato discussed politics with a group of teenagers recently. Here's what they had to say.

BEVERLY WALLACE, of Tracy Dr., is an eighth grader at Carmel Junior High School. When asked what comes to mind when she hears the word "politics," Wallace replied, "I think of money and how many votes they get, and why young people can't vote." She thinks that the voting age should be 15. Wallace didn't appear to be very trusting of politicians. "They take your money and don't do anything for you," she claimed.

PEGGY ANDERSON, a Parker Heights resident, is also in the eighth grade at Carmel. "Mostly I think about the President because he really doesn't do enough about high prices," she began. "He's making the economy harder to deal with. Instead of trying to help us, he goes across the country or helps other countries. He should pay more attention to this country because we're in need, too," Anderson maintained. The young woman doesn't believe she would ever consider going into politics herself. "There would have to be a whole lot of changes first," she declared. "One would be to be really honest with the people about where their money is going."

LINDA HOWARD, a sixth grader at Baringer, lives on Remount Rd. "I think of money and the government," she replied. Expressing her belief that politicians are not always honest, Howard explained, "If they were honest, they wouldn't take welfare checks from poor people." She might consider running for office herself some day.

DELORES RORIE, a Carmel ninth grade student, is a resident of Parker Dr. She doesn't believe politicians are honest all the time, either. Rorie would like to see the voting age lowered to "15 or 12." A one-time candidate for elective office herself, Rorie ran for class treasurer this year and, although she lost, might like to try again. Her biggest complaint about politicians is that they "should provide for old people."

TONY BENNETT of Forham Rd. attends South Mecklenburg High School. He is in the tenth grade. Bennett would also like to see the voting age lowered to 17. He tends to think of the nation's President when the subject of politics comes up. Bennett said he has never run for a school office and probably would never become a politician. He stated he's "not sure" about the honesty of today's politicians.

FRED MOORE, another eighth grader at Carmel, lives on Maiden St. Of the people interviewed, he had the most positive things to say about politicians. "Sometimes they do a good job," he asserted. Moore revealed he would like to run for office some time. He won a sixth grade election and feels that those elected should be responsible enough to do a good job for those who elected them.

MARGARET SMITH, a bit older than the students above, lives on Rosevine Rd. and works making windows. For Smith, the President is the first one who comes to mind at the word "politics." She said that politicians are "dishonest to a certain extent," and added that there are "a lot of things they need to be working on that they aren't." Smith isn't sure if local politicians are doing a good job or not. "I've been hearing about the garbage problem on the news," she noted, "and I don't think we should have to pay $8 for garbage pick-up."
