Is There Another In The Picture?

The man I love got angry with me over nothing. He is with me on Mondays through Fridays. But on Saturdays and Sundays he is nowhere around. I asked him if he was seeing someone else on the weekends since he wasn't seeing me. He became very angry. It was as though he resented my question.

I love this man very much and I don't want to do anything to hurt his feelings or make him mad at me. I told him I was very sorry. He said from now on we can be friends. I told him it looked like I love him more than he loves me. Ever since this happened, he hasn't called me yet. I am very upset. What should I do to get him back?

Heartbroken and Sorry
Dear Heartbroken,

There does seem to be a difference in the feelings you have for each other. Your boyfriend has been in the "driver's seat" in your relationship. He has set the rules for you to follow while he follows no rules.

It seems as though you have been very open and giving of yourself in your feelings towards him. While he has been secretive and closed towards you.

Love must flow from both sides. If he continues to show no interest in you, your only choice is to try and let him go.

Carole

Dear Carole,

My husband and I love each other very much but all we do is argue all the time. The things we argue about are silly. But everything that is said makes us both feel hurt and even more angry. He wants to have his way and I want to have my way.

How can we get along better so we don't have to argue so much?

"Two Stubborn People"

Dear Stubborn People,

When the subject of conflict becomes a contest between two people someone will surely feel hurt. When you have a difference of opinion try to negotiate a solution. It is not important that one person "win" and the other person loses." Giving in (some-what) or meeting in the middle, is a sign of maturity, not weakness. When both of you can respect your differences and still work to resolve the issues, both of you will "win" and good feelings can exist.
