Gov. Martin Proclaims Sunday- "National Grandparents Day"

Raleigh-Governor James G. Martin has proclaimed Sunday, September 7, 1986, as National Grandparents Day in North Carolina. In his proclamation the Governor stated that "North Carolina is pleased to have the opportunity to honor our grandparents for their wisdom, love, hard work, experience, and the special contributions to make to families and communities. These contributions have greatly added to the growth and development of North Carolina."

Human Resources Secretary Phillip J. Kirk, Jr., joined the Governor in urging North Carolinians to respect and honor their grandparents during this special observance.

He pointed out that many grandparents stay active and independent by taking part in volunteer and community projects. "Grandparents not only strengthen family and community life, they also help bridge the generation gap by creating greater understanding and friendship among young people," Kirk noted. "Their special gift of commitment and caring results in special services and care to disabled children and school students."

Elaine Stoops, Assistant Secretary for Aging, explained that there are currently two programs operated by the N.C. Division of Aging that actively involve grandparents. They are the Foster Grandparent and Intergenerational programs.

She said that there are currently four Foster Grandparent Projects in North Carolina serving 1500 children. They are the Western Carolina Center for the mentally retarded in Morganton, one of the original Foster Grandparent Projects in the 'United States; the Caswell Center for the mentally retarded in Kinston; the New River Mental Health Center in Boone; and the WAGES (Action Group for Economic Solvency) in Goldsboro. The N. C. Division of Aging sponsors and reviews the projects, all of which are funded by the federal agency ACTION.

Stoops added that the children in the Foster Grandparent Project are 21 years of age or under, in need of remedial care and training, and are referred to the program by mental health professionals. The grandparents must be 60 years of age or older and in reasonable good health. They work four hours a day, five days a week, and receive a stipend of $2.20 an hour, a hot meal, and annual medical check-ups.

"The strength of the Foster Grandparent project is that it meets the needs of both generations so successfully," she emphasized.

"The children give unconditional love to the older volunteers, which enriches their lives, and gives them a good reason for living. In return, the older adults give the children education, recreation, and technical skills, but most importantly they give love and caring."

In the Intergenerational Program, third grade students from Durham's Parkwood Elementary School adopted "grandparents" from the local Methodist Retirement Home. The grandparents work with the children in preparing school lessons as well as reading and talking together. This special program brings children and older adults together in a spirit of learning, caring, and friendship. It will serve as a successful model for other Intergenerational programs in North Carolina's public school system this fall.

Stoops also said that grandparents in North Carolina enjoy legal visitation rights with their grandchildren.

In his endeavors, Wayne states that his father, Robert Battle, has "been my main line of support. He's always encouraged me and is someone I can talk to who understands."

Wayne, himself, appears to be little affected by his own achievements and accolades. Best described as soft-spoken and very laid-back, he comments that even though he's "shooting for becoming a Mr. USA or Mr. America" his real goal in life is "peace of mind."

Like the little boy, he once was, who found joy in lifting his first set of weights, Wayne maintains that his goal is still "to be happy." To that end he concludes, "I'll stick with body-building until God tells me to do something else."

Look At Murder

Murder claims a life every 23 minutes in America, 23,000 victims each year, according to the North Carolina Medical Society.

It's the number one killer of black males between the ages of 15 and 24, the second leading killer of all people 15 to 24, and the fourth leading cause of premature death overall.

Lately, the U.S. Public Health Service has brought some fresh thinking into this otherwise dreary picture. It's looking at murder as a societal disease and preparing to attack it with proven public health strategies. Says Surgeon General Dr. C. Everett Koop: "Violence is every bit as much a public health issue for me and my successors in this century as smallpox, tuberculosis, and syphilis were for my predecessors in the last two centuries."

"An important first step is to find a way to predict homicidal behavior. Some clues may be found in a recent study of 100 juvenile delinquent boys, including nine who committed murder. The murderers had five common characteristics:

- All had symptoms of severe psychosis;
- All came from families who had histories of psychosis;
- All were products of abusive and violent home lives;
- All but one had a major brain impairment, and three showed evidence of grand mal epileptic seizures;
- All shared a pattern of violence before they committed murder, including long records of assaults, rapes, and arson.
