SPECIALISTS ALL OVER THE WORLD EXPAND GM WAR EFFORT BEYOND PRODUCTION LINE

NEW YORK.—Far-flung wartime activities of General Motors over and above its large-scale war production, through which it has made available the services of technicians, developed training facilities and utilized overseas plants and personnel in cooperation with United States and Allied military leaders all over the world, were revealed in detail today for the first time in a special message by Alfred P. Sloan, Jr., chairman, to the more than 400,000 General Motors stockholders.

Highlights of the war products field service program, launched shortly after Pearl Harbor at the request of military authorities and since greatly expanded, which has the one prime objective of assuring that GM-built war equipment is kept at top operating efficiency and available for action at the front the maximum of time, are:

"Technical centers" have been established in England, Egypt, India, Australia, New Zealand and elsewhere;

More than 200 technicians are assigned to combat areas as field observers, service or parts specialists on GM war products.

A constant flow of performance reports on GM equipment at the front is forwarded through military channels to the research laboratories and the engineering staffs, forming the basis for joint action with military technicians in steadily increasing the technical excellence of the products.

Management and other services were provided in procuring and operating three emergency assembly plants for military vehicles in the Middle East;

Assistance was provided to the Army in setting up truck reconditioning plants in specific combat areas, and to the Navy in establishing overseas service points for GM Diesel engines;

Manufacturing and assembly plants in England, India, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa have been converted to war production or assembly;

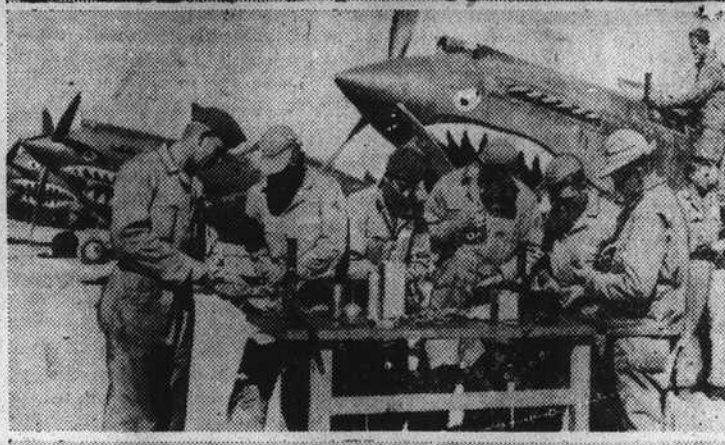

Engineering facilities and personnel in the United States have been made available for experimental and development work; The General Motors Proving Ground has become an Army testing field for war products;

Peacetime experience in warehousing and distribution of service parts has been made available to the Army and Navy;

There are 22 GM training schools in the U. S., which graduate 11,000 Army and Navy technicians in 1942 and are equipped to train 40,000 in 1943.

In concluding his report on these widespread activities, both on the home front and in far-flung combat areas, all at the request of and in cooperation with military authorities, Mr. Sloan said:

"Thus, in all phases of the war production effort, in volume out-

Top—Military trucks for the Russian Army were assembled in the open desert in Iran while a special plant was being constructed for the Army Ordnance Department. These facilities, operated by General Motors, assemble several makes of military vehicles, including Chevrolet and GMC trucks. Center—As in other combat areas, service facilities must often be improvised. Here, in China, the guns of an Allison-powered Curtiss P-40 are being repaired by an American "armament section." Below—Typical of maintenance in the field is this Army outdoor repair shop set up in a United States Army military truck convoy of supplies to Allied troops. The route of this convoy is through the most difficult terrain in Australia.
