Timely Hints By RUTH CURRENT

A summer vacation for curtains that have been on the job all winter is recommended by textile specialists this year when curtains are almost impossible to replace.

Open season for windows is a hard season on curtains, the specialists explain. In strong summer sunlight, draperies may fade, and glass curtains rot. Blowing against screens, and dust and rain from open windows are all hard on curtains.

When draperies and glass curtains are taken down, a light summer set may be put up. Or, an old set may be used. Minor repairs won't show when these old curtains are pushed back to let in as much air as possible. Or, as a third possibility, particularly where summers are hot, many families prefer to leave windows curtainless.

Cotton draperies may be washed if they are unlined, fast color, and preshrunk. Try to have other draperies dry cleaned. A good way to keep draperies from wrinkling or crushing in storage is to fold lengthwise and hang them over the horizontal bar of a coat hanger padded with paper. Several pairs can then be slipped into a large paper bag. Fold up and pin the open end of the bag. Then hang the draperies in a closet where the paper covering won't get torn.

It is best to have fragile net and lace curtains—either cotton or rayon—dry cleaned. If they must be laundered at home, the specialists advise washing them in a large muslin or mesh bag, using mild, lukewarm suds. Unless curtains can be rolled
