HAIL TO THE CHIEF.

Woodrow Wilson assumed the Presidential office amid universal enthusiasm. The occasion has been one of unalloyed joy. There is not a discordant voice mingling in the shouts of acclaim which arise from the entire United States, from Atlanta to Pacific, or if there is, it cannot make itself heard; it is drowned in the happy cheers of millions.

It will be remembered that four years ago such a blizzard of snow and sleet ushered in the Republican administration that there was serious revival of the old talk about changing the date of the ceremony to later in the spring. In striking contrast to most inaugurations, the sun shone at his approval of Wilson, in keeping with the spirit of the day.

The tone of the inaugural address is not one of congratulation for either himself or the party. Woodrow Wilson realizes that the real struggle is yet to come, for the President since the war has faced greater or more difficult tasks.

"This is not a day of triumph," he declares, "it is a day of dedication."

BAWLED UP MODERN MARINES.

The author appearing in yesterday's paper, coming straight from the heart of one not generally known as possessing poetic temperament, is interesting as a survival of the old custom of ballad-making, and doubtless will be of value to the future historian of these times.

The influence of throwing upon the author is easily seen in that he holds out a glimmer of hope at the last, exhorting the modern marines to come home, and reminding them that they may yet "take it in the Picture Show."

As usual, the Senate was the center of attraction, because of the first appearance there of the two new executives and the retiring one, President Taft. Outside the Capitol an immense throng went cheering through the Capitol. The last stand of the "old guard" furnished the political tragedy for the great civic drama. In the Senate and House scores of old political war horses gazed with tear-dimmed eyes for probably the last time upon the adjournment scenes. Recreases in the House, while final bills were given finishing touches, furnished relaxation for the tenseness of real, personal bereavement in the retirement of many members there. Hundreds of American flags were waved, while the members sang patriotic songs and made speeches. "Uncle Joe" Cannon was the special object of much attention, ending his long years of public life. Lingering handclaps and "God-speed" were given to the retiring members. Partisan lines were wiped out in the expressions of personal friendship. In the Senate many foreign diplomats, in court uniforms, were present in the galleries, adding their touch of color to the brilliant and distinguished audience. Appointment of committees to notify President Taft that the two houses were ready to adjourn, was the last official act of the retiring bodies. While awaiting the report of these committees, songs and speeches reverberated through the House while the more staid Senators said their last farewells. Congestion of business, as usual, occurred. Appropriation bills were jammed for passage into the last few hours. The Sixty-Second Congress when it closed had been in almost continuous session since early in the summer of 1911. There were three sessions in all, the first in 1911—a special session for consideration of the Canadian reciprocity treaty—the tariff session from December 4, 1911, to August 24, 1912, and the session ending Tuesday, which began December 2, 1912.

Trusting Trick of Messengers. The stamp trick is a very common one with messengers because of the amount of amusement derived from it. It consists in sticking a new stamp of a step or some prominent place, and watching the various attempts of passers-by to pick it up, which, of course, are unsuccessful—London Mail.
