PRIDAY, JANUARY 30, 1914.

Meriace of the Crowded Car. a narrow car, seats filled with persons attempting to read newspapers while the car swings and jotts along its way, atales jammed with men and wemen, boys and girls and tiny children swaying and rubbing one against the other, coughing and enceains, pushing and pressing—what a night for a progressive age; what a sermon for the moralist; what a despiir for the student of public health and hygiene!

Endless problems are presented by this picture, seen daily in nearly every american city. Most important is the meance to health from the thousands or bacteria hidden in, the thronts of diseased men and women and aprayed diseased mes and women and agrayed directly into a stagmant air moist and summoving in the absence of sufficient means of ventilation. Virulent organ issue are inhaled into the throats and lungs of tired workers and tiny babes who form an excellent host for their quick cultivation. The fare for the ride is small, but the cost cannot be estimated in terms of dollars and cents -Journal of the American Medical As

The Reef in Literature.

Northern literature has never taken the roof seriously. There have been many books written from the view-point of windows. The study window is usual. Then there is a college window and the Thrums window; also, there is a window viewpoint as yet scarcely expressed-shat of the boy of Stevenson's peems with his nose flattened against the class: convuleacence tened against the glass; convalescence looking for saliormen with one leg What is "Un Philosophe sous let Tolts" but a garret and its prost But does Souvestre ever go up on the roof? He contents himself with open ing his casement and feeding crumbs to the birds. Not once does he climb out and scramble around the mansard On wintry nights neither his legs no thoughts join the windy devils that play tempest overhead. Then, again from Westminster bridges, from cour try lanes, from crowded streets, from ships at sea and mountain tops have sonnets been thrown to the moon; no once from the roof.—Yale Review.

Building a Heuse in France.

It is unusual for a house, however small, to be erected in France without the service of an architect, who not only draw the plans, but actually superintends the work. Usually it is he who orders the building material and assures himself that its quality is up to the specifications and requirements. The contractor and his workman perform their duties in conformity with the architect's orders, and the latter, who is assully a man with capital, advances the funds required in order that the contractor need not wait for payment until the building is completed. Moreover, the French law imposes on the architect a serious recaponsibility, since he as well as the contractor is responsible for all defects of construction during a period of ten years.

A Flash of Howells' Wit.

In the "Letters of Charles Ellot Norton" is one written by him to Ellot Norton in 1907, in which is this glimpse of Howells with a flash of his quick wit: "Mr. Howells was with us on Sun "Mr. Howells was with us on Sun-day and seemed better than I had ex-pected, considering how poorly he was during the greater part of the winter and spring. Pleasant as he always is, he never was pledisanter, and we had four or five hours of animated talk, by which a vast deal of ground was cov-ered. His humor was delightful as of old. One quick bit of wit is worth preserving. I was speaking to him of Dr. James' new book and said that it was brilliant, but not clear. Talke his father, said Mr. Howella, 'who wrote father,' said Mr. Howella, 'who wrote father, said Mr. Howella, 'who wrote the "Secret of Swedenborg" and kept it."

"Well, I bardly call it that. What she means was she came very near drowning one day, and the whole life saving crew ran after her."—Philadelphia Lodger.

Witty Retort.

An Irishman once was traveling in a truin with a friend when two very stout indies entered the carriage. They placed themselves on each side of Pat.

"Are you sure you are comfortable, Pat?" the friend asked.

"Sure, I haven't much room to grumble," was the refry,—London Express.
