What Germany, England and France Have Done.

INTERESTING COMPARISONS.

In an Article Patrick Abercrombie Aids Explains What the Principal European Nations Have Contributed to the Science of City Making.

An opportunity to learn how American city planning compares with that of other nations is afforded by an article by Patrick Abercrombie of Liverpool, published in the Town Planning Review. It is impossible to print his paper in full, a matter of regret, as it presents an interesting analysis of what each nation as a nation has contributed to the study of town planning and city organization. The statements as to foreign nations may be thus summarized:

Germany's town planning competition, as it has been called, has been lauded for its originality. It is interesting to note that every German town has as a matter of course, its plan drawn in advance upon which the utmost care and thought are expended. Unlimited funds are given to it. The growing of cities, to separate manufacturing from residences and to divide residential areas so that the further from the center the fewer the houses will be, the elevation of fortifications into wide "ring streets," the careful and judicious preservation of the ancient centers of cities, the recognized value of acquiring large tracts of land outside the town, which is straggling amounts to 500 square yards per inhabitant and in time to three-fifths of its total area; the practice of holding competitions in street design for new roads and the importation of the garden suburb idea from England are declared to be the striking characteristics of German city planning. As to housing Mr. Abercrombie says:

"On the whole, as compared with the advantage of the English one family house set in an unsullied moorland of dreary streets, Germany has the monumental barracks in a wide street, with some park, play space or promenade always at hand. There is an absence of meanness and an insistence on the cheerfulness of city life in the best garden, municipal buildings, etc. Some serious attempt is made at studying the art of city life."

The genius of the French nation has been directed toward the physical construction of the town rather than its organization or social study and toward the more monumental and architectural aspects of the former. Paris is the school of Europe for formal monumental town planning both in its older work—such as the boulevards, vistas and gardens and squares—and in the more recent work of Hausmann.

Hausmann's modernization of Paris in its comprehensive grasp of traffic, hygiene, light and air, is the most brilliant piece of town planning in the world. It has, however, to be confessed that it does not complete the circle, though it traverses three quarters of it, but from a sociological standpoint he hardly considered the question of the inhabitants apart from the streets and public life. Recreation is faintly thought of.

France cannot be twitted today with neglect of social conditions. Her two housing laws of 1904 and 1906 are admirable.

England is declared to have made one great contribution, but generally to have been backward. Traffic conveniences and monumental qualities have alike been lacking.

The normal suburban development consists in vast areas covered with monotonous two story houses at the rate of forty to fifty to the acre. This may be considered as a mere air healthy type of development than the foreign type, but it results in a social degeneration manifested externally in a drab and dreary existence, more horrible than disease. With the exception perhaps of the blocks of New York there can be no conglomeration of habitations more distressful than the east end of London.

It is in the garden village city suburb idea that England has made its contribution. This movement is too well known to need recapitulating.

Paris possesses what is probably the finest institution in Europe for the scientific historic study of a town—the Bibliothèque Historique de la Ville de Paris.

How slowly the use of public school buildings as social centers grows is shown strikingly in a recent issue foundation pamphlet. In all the United States only 620 schoolhouses are used for polling places during election.

Yet the so called political uses of schoolhouses are coming to be the best of all community uses of the community's house. In many a school where debates and muscades are welcomed a group of men may not get down to grips with their tax rate or street cleaning if they foregather as patriots.

One Hundred and Twenty Men Are Required to Care For Them.

A report on the raising, planting and upkeep of the trees which so beautify the streets and boulevards of Paris has been made to the department of commerce at Washington by Vice-Consul General Luden Memminger, stationed at Paris.

From statistics furnished by the municipal department having charge of the trees of Paris Mr. Memminger learns that they number all told 98,050, cared for throughout the year by a force of men numbering 120, at a cost of nearly $100,000.

Mr. Memminger says that on an average 1,100 to 1,200 new trees are planted every year to replace those which have died, have been overthrown by vehicles or have been removed for other reasons.

"The city of Paris," continues Mr. Memminger, "has large and varied plantations just outside the fortifications, where flowers, exotic shrubs and trees are grown. One hundred and thirteen houses for plants, exotic shrubs and flowers are heated from one central heating plant, distributing hot water through a nine and one-half mile system of pipes. The object of this central heating organization is not, as the head gardener explains, with a view to economy. In fact such a system is far more costly than separate installations for each group of hot-houses, but is thus arranged to avoid the existence of a series of mighty chimneys which would destroy the artistic effect of the grounds, which are more or less a public resort and show place."

Keystone City Planning.

The Mitchell bill providing for a city planning department in cities of the third class in Pennsylvania was recently approved by the governor. It creates an additional executive department to be known as the department of city planning to be in charge of a city planning commission to be composed of five persons to be selected by the mayor and council for five year terms.

They are to have authority to supervise the location and widening of streets, parks, parkways, playgrounds, public buildings, civic centers and other public improvements for three miles outside of city limits. They are to have power of disapproval, which, however, will not act as a veto.
