ANNOUNCE MARRIAGE

D. T. Long, of Shallotte, announces the marriage of his daughter, Vera Belle, to Ephraim L. Swain, July 11, at Conway, S. C.

While all the fuss and feathers at the Capitol, the regular machinery is operating in a routine manner. All is not serene, however, as the patronage aspect incidental to disciplinary measures against rebellious Democrats are put into effect prior to the insurgency over the judicial reform. The distribution of political plans was largely controlled by Democratic Senators.

The retaliatory tactics of the Administration find the rebels in a defiant mood, but their henchmen back home, responsible for the maintenance of political fences, say they are already feeling the pinch. Obviously, the missionary work of Vice-President Garner of bringing the erring brethren back into the fold after the issue has blown over will be complicated until an agreement is reached on the control of Federal jobs now denied anti-court Senators. Office-holders now on the payroll with the endorsement of the Democratic outlaws are trembling in their boots as many are not protected by a Civil Service rating.

Our Washington LETTER

(By National Editorial Ass'n.)

Early Adjournment.

It seems that the Congress will adjourn with its greatest chore chalked up for the voters' attention as "unfinished business." Legislation, which has received more or less perfunctory attention during the six months following the introduction of the highly controversial court reform bill, will apparently be shelved in the mad heater-skelter rush to adjourn until next winter. The truth is that Congress has not been in a serious mood for studious consideration of vital measures. The fast and furious developments, which followed the sudden passing of Majority leader Robinson, stripped the legislative assembly of all desire to devote its time and efforts to major matters other than the judicial issue. The intervening six months between adjournment and the next session will undoubtedly be devoted to stock-taking among the voters to determine their reactions to the hectic scenes, which have marked the present gathering of lawmakers.

New Speaker.

The victory of the administration forces in putting over Senator Barkley in the Democratic caucus as the successor to Robinson is viewed in various lights. The opponents of the Rooseveltian philosophy including the Republicans feel that the contest was too close to presage a definite triumph of the court reform advocates. In fact, the opposition is breathing easier as they feel that their movement would have been checked and a turn taken toward harmony in the ranks of the court dissenters had Senator Harrison won. In the parlance of the prize ring, Barkley will be on the hot seat as the anti-Administration forces within his party are no longer obligated to pull their punches, which would have been in order had Senator Harrison been awarded the mantle of Robinson.

Returns

The return of Vice-President Garner is considered significant. Both sides are watching his maneuvers because they believe that this astute Texas politician has the answer to the adjournment question up his sleeve. The rumor has persisted in private conversations among Senators that the presiding officer of the Senate is not in sympathy with the court plan pushed by the White House.

Unfinished

An early adjournment will leave several important New Deal measures high and dry. Uppermost on the program of forgotten ideas is the wage and hour bill, which has encountered apathy among the labor union factions. It is claimed that Congress has been overlaid with Rooseveltian panaceas. If the Supreme Court issue had been settled earlier in the session it is taken for granted that a majority of the White House proposals for regulation of this and that would have been enacted into law without much opposition. The squabble over the judiciary completely overshadowed all other ideas so that the chances are they will be shelved into the Congressional limbo without a tear. The solons are perfectly frank in expressing their desire to get back home to check on sentiment among their constituents as to their conduct on a variety of issues.

Routine

While all the fuss and feathers at the Capitol, the regular machinery is operating in a routine manner. All is not serene, however, as the patronage aspect incidental to disciplinary measures against rebellious Democrats are put into effect prior to the insurgency over the judicial reform. The distribution of political plans was largely controlled by Democratic Senators.

Late Buck Clewis Wasn't Only Bear Hunter In Family

J. P. Clewis, nephew of the late Buck Clewis, far-famed bear hunter of Crusee Island was in Whiteville Friday and recounted a bear story that ranks well with the best ever told by his illustrious kinsman.

Two summers ago residents of Crusee were losing considerable green corn to bears that raided their fields at night. Forced to take some action for their own protection, the farmers organized a bear hunt in which several men participated.

Mr. Clewis was one of the hunters. Taking a stand on the edge of a swamp beside a path leading to a cornfield he soon heard the dogs trailing toward him. Crouching in the bushes, he cocked and primed his gun so he would be ready for the bear as it came past.

Soon the animal came into view, trotting back to the comparative safety of the swamp. When about sixty steps away it suddenly stopped and sniffed the air. In that moment Mr. Clewis saw that the dogs were running a she-bear and her cub, which followed close behind.

Now a mother bear isn't anything to play with, and a split second later this one was running full tilt toward Mr. Clewis. A less experienced bear hunter might have become excited by that sudden change from hunter to the hunted, but not Mr. Clewis. In all his hunting days, he said, he had never seen a bear nor a deer that failed to change his course toward the hunter before he reached him.

He sat there waiting for the mother bear to turn; but she never did. Head-on she came with her mouth wide open. She was one jump (Continued on page 4.)
