In the matter of a date for the 1937 regatta Southport and the Carolina Yacht Club may possibly have depended too much on the kindness of a very uncertain Weather man. If there is any period in the year when the Gulf Stream winds are still at this point on the coast, it is from about the middle of August on through September. For the past several months we have had the finest sort of yachting weather and we can only hope that this dispensation will continue through

But a storm off the coast last week leaves little on which to base such a hope. Anything that comes out of the West Indies in August or September is generally followed by low pressure and a period of stillness at Southport. It may be that way here at the inauguration of the annual event. We can only hope that it will not. If it should develop into windless days well here's reminding the folks that Southport offers the best fishing on the coast.
