TIME and TIDE By JIMMIE HARPER

It was June 28, 1939, and the USS Gridley, a destroyer, had passed through Southport harbor on her way upriver for the Wilmington bicentennial celebration. Her picture appeared on the front page of The Pilot that week. Capt. Fred Willing had been the pilot. We pause for a moment to insert editorial comment: The hot topic on the sports fishing scene nowadays, 1959, seems to be the recent exploitation of blue marlin fishing off Southport. Not too long ago, no more than ten years, sailfishing was the newly discovered sport, and only a few of these gamefish were boated by fishing parties. And twenty years ago, when no sailfish had been caught and no marlin had been imagined, the most controversial fish seemed to be the barracuda-the most exotic semi-tropical fish to be caught in local waters up to that time. And then, in 1939, fishing for barracuda was just starting. Headlines proclaimed the landing of almost each one of these "wolves of the sea." So it was for the week of June 28. Charlotte interests were sponsoring a rather general fishing contest, and had requested that four of these fish be furnished for display in the Queen City. They were to be a late entrant in the contest.

It was June 28, 1944, and two members of the Armed Services graced the initial sheet that week. One was WAVE Emma Lou Harrelson, and the other was Marine Sgt. Ennis Weeks, Winners in the recent Southport Woman's Club baby show had been announced. Prettiest child under 6 months was Mary Louise Herring. Hope Harrison had been judged most attractive girl in the 3-5 age group. Another service figure, Cdr. Don Winslow of the U.S. Navy, was also on the front page, advocating the Continued On Page Two
