TIME and TIDE

By JIMMIE HARPER

It was September 27, 1939, and Elwood Mintz, a sophomore at Louisiana College, had been elected vice-president of the Y. M. C. A. there. Three slot machines had been confiscated by the Sheriff's Department; the Sea Owl, a yacht well known locally, had been in port on the preceding weekend and had entertained Southport visitors; and daily shrimp catches were running from 12-45 bushels per boat. And in a front page item, with no names mentioned, it was reported that a breathless lady had arrived at one of the local churches on Sunday evening to sing the final hymn and hear the benediction pronounced. She had been unaware that the time for evening services had been upped an hour.

Our Not Exactly editor that week devoted considerable time and space to the canine citizens of Southport. He noted with some surprise the number of water spaniels in town, and made nominations for the most beautiful dog, an Irish setter belonging to H. B. Smith. The Larsen service station at Sawdust Trail was now open for business; there were plans for construction of tennis courts at Leland High School; and there was some serious talk of constructing a fishing pier at Long Beach.

It was September 27, 1944, and news had come across country that Lt. Col. M. R. Sanders would shortly go to the South Pacific to set up a Naval repair base. One news article that week stated that school attendance laws would be obeyed, while another stated that Prof. Glen Tucker was quite well pleased with attendance at Bolivia. Otis Garner was home on leave after having served with the Normandy invasion forces; teachers (Continued on Page Four)

Big Tarpon Is Brought In Here

Just when the word was spreading that tarpon fishing was over for the season, Robert Waters of Wilmington brought in an 80-lb beauty from the point of Bald Head island Saturday morning.

The fish measured 69 inches long and 29 inches in girth. It struck an artificial lure which Waters was plug-casting with in the surf.

"At first I thought it was a channel bass," Waters said. "They break water sometimes. But after it jumped a few times then I knew it was a tarpon."

Altogether, the tarpon jumped clear of the water 11 times.

"It never did take out much line," Waters said. He estimated it took less than 100 yards of line.

He was using a spinning reel, 17 pound test monofilament line and a light, spun glass rod.

No Reports Of Damage Following Tuesday Winds And High Tides That Hit This Area

RED CROSS DISASTER PLANS WERE READY

Only Minor Interruptions Occurred In Normal Activities For Brunswick County Residents

Brunswick county citizens braced themselves Tuesday for a storm that struck instead in the vicinity of Charleston, S. C. Strong winds and high tides menaced nearby coastal areas, but when both had receded there was little damage to be found in their wake.

The lessons of past experiences were valuable as preparations were made to protect against loss of life and property. Red Cross officials has the full cooperation of school leaders in designating each of the schools as a storm shelter, and provision was made to have them open in case the need arose. The school people stayed in touch with weather reports to determine what course to follow in keeping school open. The U. S. Coast Guard, Highway Patrol and members of the Sheriff's Department had charge of clearing beaches and other low areas in the face of rising tides. CAP members, Civil Defense officials, and ham radio operators afforded a guarantee that communications would remain open.

These were the precautionary measures taken. What actually happened was that high winds began to lash the coast early Tuesday morning, abated somewhat during the late afternoon, then resumed their fury Tuesday night. There were intermittent, heavy showers, particularly during the early part of the day on Tuesday. However, official Weather Bureau readings indicated a total rainfall of only 1.70-inches at Southport.
