

Grizzly Bears Wear Radios—

Idea For Bird Watchers?

Grizzly bears in Yellowstone National Park will soon wear miniature radios to broadcast their whereabouts to naturalists studying their habits.

Tracking the grizzlies by radio is a new development in a long-range study aimed at preventing their extinction. The National Geographic Society and the National Science Foundation are supporting the project.

Tiny transmitters, attached to the bears by a plastic collar, will broadcast a continuous signal over a radius of five miles or more. Directional transmitters will keep the bears' locations pinpointed despite rough terrain. The transmitters were developed by the Philco Corporation's Western Development Laboratories in Palo Alto, California.

Bears Wander Afar

Grizzlies wander long distances. Without transmitters, scientists would find it virtually impossible to keep tabs on them. But the radio signals will keep broadcasting even while the bears are hibernating.

Frank and John Craighead of the Montana Cooperative Wildlife Research Unit, leaders of the study, have already developed methods for capturing the bears so that transmitters may be placed on them. The animals can be caught in steel covey traps baited with bacon, honey, and pineapple juice. They are then injected with a harmless muscle relaxant, that keeps them from moving while a transmitter is attached.

The Craigheads also shoot bears on the loose with a special rifle that propels a harmless flying syringe which empties the relaxant into the animals.

The Craigheads developed the technique when they began placing distinctive yellow, red, and blue markers on the bears to identify them individually from afar. The plastic markers are looped through slits in the bears' ears. By the beginning of the 1961 season they had tagged 177 grizzlies roam the park.

The largest tagged so far weighed 780 pounds. Weight tests show a bear may gain an average of three pounds a day during the summer.

The Craigheads are making impressions and casts of bears' teeth to evolve a system of esti-

Nothing Like Boojum Tree

The strange boojum tree may be nearing extinction. Then again, it may not.

No one knows very much about the boojum's past, present, or future. Most botanists never have seen one, because it thrives only in the hostile central desert of Mexico's Baja California, the National Geographic Society says.

Some dendrologists believe the boojum is a dying remnant of a large family. Others think the tree may be the forerunner of a new line.

But everyone who has seen a boojum tree agrees on one thing—there is nothing like it.

Upside-down Carrot One botanist describes the mating bear ages. They are X-raying the jaws of bears, and collecting bear blood, milk, and digestive juices for studies of bear physiology.

Cub Helps Out An orphaned grizzly cub kept near the campsite has provided information on growth, tooth emergence, bone development, and behavior. The cub's mother had become too friendly with tourists and was shipped to the Bronx Zoo.

The cub's brother proved as young boojum as "an upside-down carrot improbably provided with slender, spiny, and usually leafless branches, which seems to be stuck helter-skelter into a tapering body."

Larger trees lose the small branches and grow thorns in their trunks. The skinny boles may reach a height of 40 to 50 feet, tapering to a point from a base only a foot or 18 inches in diameter.

Older trees frequently branch in an eccentric manner toward the top, sending out sinuous limbs. Sometimes the top of the tree itself curves downward until the tip touches the ground to form an arch.

Natives of Baja California call the tree a cirio, or wax taper, because it suggests an altar candle.

The boojum is not a cactus and not a tree in the usual sense. But it is admirably adapted to desert life and can grow in a place that goes without rain a year or more.

The trunk's resinous outer cylinder protects a large spongy core. When the soil is damp, the inner pith stores moisture.

The leaves appear only at favorable seasons and are capable of manufacturing great amounts of food in a short time. In dry weather, the leaves fall.

Dreamlike Landscape Joseph Wood Krutch, the writer and naturalist, wrote, of the boojum: "It dominates the landscape and imposes upon it an air of dreamlike unreality. If one is reminded of anything, it is either the imagined surface of some distant planet or of one of those reconstructed scenes from a remote geological era when there were no real trees, only huge club mosses and horsetails magnified to gigantic size."

It is startling to come suddenly upon a grove of boojums. The tree got its popular English name from such an encounter. Godfrey Sykes, the renowned desert ecologist, first saw the tree in 1922. He gazed intently for a few moments and then said, "Ho, ho, a boojum, definitely a boojum."

Sykes was thinking of Lewis Carroll's poem, "The Hunting of the Snark," an account of an expedition to find a legendary creature which sometimes took the form of a boojum, an inhabitant of lonely desert shores.

WATERFRONT

Continued From Page 1 trailer and went running off, hauling the boat and motor behind him. The first view we had was when he got an auto-tow and cruised up Moore street. The proud owner was reclining in simulated ease and luxury, keeling and waving to his slightly jealous friends and well-wishers on every side. Tuesday he continued his celebration by staying off from work and giving his cousin, Sonny Ganey, a motorboat trip home by way of the Cape Fear and Northeast rivers.
