

GARDEN TIME m.e.gardner n.c.state college

The miracle of blooming plants at Christmastime is wrought by your commercial flower grower and your florist, who carefully bring a great variety of plants into bloom for you—cyclamen, azalea, poinsettia, chrysanthemums, begonia and many others.

As gifts, flowering plants are perfect. As business gifts they are colorful and long-lasting. As gifts for family and friends, they express your holiday message with feeling and meaning.

As decorations, flowering plants add a little something special to Christmas festivities. Use a single plant 'most anywhere in the house. If you have a stairway, place a plant on each of the three lower steps as a friendly welcome to entering guests.

A handsome holly arrangement around a candelabrum with red candles will be an eye-catcher on the mantle. This same idea will look pretty on a chest top or buffet setting.

Boquets of bright red carnations will add a festive touch to table tops. Mass some Christmas greens in large containers to add touches of greenery throughout the house.

clusters on the corners. For a dramatic and timely centerpiece, arrange several cut poinsettia blooms with greens in a shallow bowl. Or, if you would rather, ring the bases of bright Christmas candles with holly and greens. Put three or more down the center of the table. A holly wreath might be placed on the back of each chair with place cards attached to the tops of the wreaths.

Germans Curious About Our Foods

New things to eat are a big hit with German homemakers, if crowds at the U. S. Ford Fair 1961 in Hamburg, Germany, are any indication. And Germans have an enormous curiosity about American foods.

This is the view of Fair officials who have been watching cake mixes sold off shelves in the Fair's miniature U. S. super market at the rate of 2,000 packages a day. The run on mixes gives them good clues to future market demand in Germany, since the ready-to-mix cake packages are not specially priced for Fair-goers and actually come fairly expensive as German food prices go.

But the German desire for new things extends to numerous other items—wheat bread toasted and buttered, canned American-Chinese foods and sudyaki dinners, hamburgers and barbecue sauces and relishes, Maryland fried chicken, soy flour and non-fat dry milk.

And American-style doughnuts—the kind without jelly not well-known to the German public before. Doughnuts made with American wheat flour have taken the Fair by storm. Germans young and old pronounce them delicious. All in all, observers in Hamburg think German homemakers won't quibble much on price. They want quality in their food purchases today and are willing—and also able—to pay for it. They have vivid memories, for one thing, of the poor quality food on their markets in the bitter years just after World War II.

Unfortunately for the housewives who would like to buy them, some of these products are not available in German stores due to import restrictions. The cake mix situation had Fair officials tearing their hair before the Fair was two days old. Seven of the 13 flavors from vanilla to pineapple were gone by then. Supplies expected to carry them through the 10-day Fair were gone by the fourth day.

Most popular cake mix flavor with the German buyers, mostly women, was marble cake, a mixture of chocolate and vanilla. Yellow and vanilla cakes rated next in demand.

The German public at large has never been considered flexible in its ideas about food. Potatoes every day and their famed sausages are centuries-old food habits. But modern living and communications, Germany's booming prosperity, increased international travel, and the presence of so many Americans in Germany are helping change all this.

Germany is already this country's fourth largest customer for agricultural products, and the U. S. Department of Agriculture forces even bigger markets for many products of the American farm—especially frozen poultry and the packaged convenience foods.

The Henry Stone Cafeteria has been blessed with new chairs and tables. They are very pretty and the students are doing a good job keeping them clean.
