Garden Time

Annuals bloom quickly from seed and give an abundance of color for the flower beds and borders. They are called annuals because they develop from seed, produce flowers, ripen fresh seed and die in one year.

Annuals are available in great variety. The reason for this is the attention the plant breeders have given to these popular garden favorites. They are available in many colors and growth habits and have a wide range of adaptability.

They may be used effectively in mass bedding arrangements to provide a long season of color. Tall-growing kinds may be used for background effect. There are also a large number of low-growing types which are excellent for borders and edging beds, walks and paths. Frequently, they are used as rock garden plants and in window boxes.

The majority of hardy annuals are not too demanding from the standpoint of soil types but are affected more by temperature and light. In fact temperature and light conditions determine the season as well as the duration of flowering.

Seed should be planted in well-prepared soil. A common fault here is sowing the seed too thickly and not thinning the young seedlings sufficiently to give room for full development.

Another common mistake is covering the seed too deep. The very small seed, planted in well-prepared soil, may be "watered in," using the garden hose with the nozzle adjusted to a fine spray. A sprinkling can may also be used.

Such plants as sweet alyssum and the marigolds are true annuals. Some other plants, while technically classed as annuals because their term in the flower garden is determined more by low temperatures at the end of the season than by their normal life cycle. In this group would be included verbena, petunia, dusty miller, salvia and many other.

When planning your list of varieties be sure to include some that can be dried for arrangements during the winter months—globeflower, statice and strawflower, to name a few of the many available.
