not only be operated safely, but reliably," Richey said.

Both nuclear generating units at Brunswick were shut down by CP&L on April 21 to accomplish what then was said to be week-long repairs of walls in the emergency diesel generator building.

Since April the estimated time of repairs has been repeatedly extended as CP&L inspectors found more work to do and the NRC insisted on being advised about the company's plans to resume normal operation.

The extent of the CP&L inspection and repair program, and the company's problems, seems typified by a CP&L enumeration of corrective maintenance projects for the NRC last Friday:

On April 21, Brunswick had 4,031 corrective maintenance projects to address. Since then, 7,763 have been added, 6,005 have been worked off, leaving a backlog of 5,789, including 1,939 from the original list.

Jon Johnson, heading the NRC Region II delegation in Friday's meeting at the CP&L visitors center, said he was pleased by the CP&L presentation.

"That meeting was the first indication that they realize they have quite a bit of unscheduled work left to accomplish," Johnson said.

"I was happy to hear for the first time that they don't know a date for startup. The last meeting we came to they were projecting startup in October, and I didn't see how that was possible."

Throughout Friday's session Johnson repeatedly asked CP&L presenters, "How do you know you've identified all significant deficiencies ... How do you know you've identified all the significant corrosion problems ... How do you know you've gotten a good inspection?"

And while CP&L speakers tried to reassure him -- "We want to be skeptical in what we are doing; we want issues to surface," said plant superintendent Jack Spencer -- Johnson, deputy director of the Region II division of reactor projects, scheduled a meeting here for October 23 with his questions still in the air.

"What I was trying to get CP&L to answer," Johnson said Monday, "is that they're satisfied with their inspections. That's why I want to put that on the agenda for the next meeting."

A CP&L spokesman said Tuesday that 700 additional workers at the Brunswick plant -- mainly contractor employees with Power Plant Maintenance, Bechtel and Becon -- are working to bring the outage to a conclusion. Though there are more contract workers than in late summer, the spokesman said, "We don't expect that number to be growing any further."

Zoning

asked if the district could alter zoning once it had been imposed in the northern portion of the district, and Foy said that was not possible.

Chairman James W. Smith suggested that special legislation by the N.C. General Assembly could give the district the right to revise zoning.

"If that could be done," he said,

ALS will resume

The state office of emergency medical services has approved the implementation of part of Brunswick County's advanced life support (ALS) program, county medical director Harry Johnson said Tuesday.

Effective immediately, Johnson said, rescue workers will be able to monitor and use defibrillators for heart attack victims. And in about a month, he said all EMS workers should be able to begin using intravenous medications again.

The state suspended the county's ALS program in August because of apparent deficiencies in the ALS training program. Since then, rescue workers have been unable to use defibrillators or intravenous medications.

To get the ALS program back on line as quickly as possible, county EMS officials developed a plan of action to verify all previous ALS training and conduct retraining courses for all county rescue workers.

"We've gotten everything done, and we've revamped the program," Johnson said.

"then we could go in and fine-tune anything we wanted to."

The board was also advised both by Foy and engineering consultant Finley Boney on steps that must be taken in development of a viable district.

Foy said of proposed zoning in the southern portion, "You need to nail down a planner, then set forth schedules and timetables for zoning. You have decided there would be zoning. Now you have to decide what type of zoning you want."

Boney told the board, "Zoning is of the utmost necessity. Zoning is your first tool."

He listed other necessities as well: a subdivision ordinance, sewer use ordinance, tap fee scheduling and a water service extension ordinance.

"Before January we should have one set of ordinances," Boney said. "We should have our zoning package ready by the first of the year."

Those who spoke out against the proposed ordinance, on the other hand, were met with round after round of applause.

"Zoning is all right, but this is not zoning. It's dictatorship just like Joe Stalin would have written," said Bolivia resident Robert Maultsby.

Thurman Gause of Shallotte called the proposed ordinance a form of slavery designed for black people.

"We have a hard enough time as it comments into consideration," said commissioner Frankie Rabon, the strongest opponent of zoning on the board. "And we'll respond to all of them by letter."

Only one person spoke out strongly in favor of zoning Tuesday, and he was greeted with muffled boos and hisses.

"I thank you for having the vision and the guts to get this to where it is now," Ocean Isle Beach resident Nick Newton said. "I do not know of any rule or regulation that does not offend someone, somewhere. Please do not bow to the pressure of special interest groups and water this thing down."

Southport resident Bob Quinn said he was in favor of the zoning ordinance, but added that he believed slaughterhouses and hazardous waste treatment facilities should be removed from the list of special exceptions in the rural industrial zone -- which is located primarily in the Southport area due to the proximity of Carolina Power & Light Co. and Sunny Point.

"We should specifically prohibit is, with all your taxes and permits. According to this, we won't be able to do nothing without a permit. Everything's forced on us whether we want it or not, and you all act like you own the county. Pretty soon, everyone else will leave, and we'll be stuck with this piece of junk," Gause said, waving the proposed zoning ordinance in the air.

Southport attorney Henry Foy spoke on behalf of the Southeast Brunswick Sanitary District, and said that the proposal was not well thought out and would conflict with existing planned uses of land.

The proposed ordinance as it is currently written would prevent the sanitary district from constructing its sewage treatment plant without the approval of the board of adjustments. (See related story, page 2.) The water treatment plant on Highway 211 and Brunswick Electric Membership Corporation would also be non-conforming land uses under the current proposals, Foy said.

Attorney Bill Fairley spoke on behalf of Orton property owner Laurence Sprunt and requested that Sprunt's 12,000 acres of land be zoned heavy manufacturing rather than rural. Fairley said the land would be "uniquely attractive" to businesses needing large tracts of land and access to the river and the railroad.

"The highest and best use of that land would be a manufacturing or industrial use," Fairley said. "There is currently no land in Brunswick County for industrial or commercial purposes that's not already zoned for those purposes, and that is a recipe for economic disaster."

Those who spoke out against the proposed ordinance, on the other hand, were met with round after round of applause.

homes were destroyed.

"If my single-wide mobile home was destroyed, I'd have to replace it with a double-wide, and I can't afford it," declared Ocean Isle Beach resident Donna Hughes. "You're telling me what to do with my property, and unless I'm hurting someone you shouldn't step in."

Many people said they did not want county officials telling them what to do with their property.

"You went too far," said Wanda Bean of Holden Beach. "We pay taxes on the land and you turn around and tell us what we can do with it. To me that's communist."
