Clay Andrews holds the net as Barry Bey, South Brunswick High School aquaculture teacher, shows off a catfish, one of more than 4,000 fish stocked Friday in a freshwater pond on the Turtle Creek development in Long Beach. The VICA community service project got largemouth bass, bluegill, channel bass and catfish from Walden Creek Fish Farm. The hauling unit was donated by Brunswick Aquafarms. The effort got national coverage when footage taken by WWAY-TV3 was broadcast on CNN Headline News.

Ocean City Chevrolet begins drive to provide school needs

Ocean City Chevrolet of Shallotte is among Chevrolet dealers who have announced a nationwide campaign to provide free computers and other educational equipment to school classrooms.

The program, called "Driving for Education", was launched Monday by Ocean City Chevrolet.

Ed Mintz stressed that "Driving for Education" is a no-pressure/no-purchase-necessary opportunity for families, friends and other members of the community to help earn high-tech educational tools for their schools.

"They simply visit Ocean City Chevrolet and test drive any new vehicle during their school's designated Test Drive Week," he said.

"When a predetermined number of 'proof of drive' certificates are turned in, the schools may then choose from 27 different educational awards, ranging from Apple computer systems to Magnavox audio/visual equipment, Encyclopedia Britannica, Texas Instruments calculators and Wilson sport-

"It's as simple as that," he stated.

Lauded by the U. S. Department of Education and praised by governors coast to coast, this unique "Partnership for Education" program is "a real life-saver for America's financially strapped institutions," Roger B. Porter, assistant for economic and domestic policy to President Bush, said. "Chevrolet leadership in working to improve education will not only help individual schools and students, but also inspire other business to become involved."

South principal Sellers goes to school on leadership skills

One Brunswick County school administrator returned to the classroom this fall to expand her management and leadership skills with new information in areas such as law and curriculum through the Principals' Executive Program at the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill.

Sue Sellers, principal of South Brunswick High School, was among 32 principals and superintendents at the Institute of Government. When they completed the 25-day program October 8, the principals were considered to be more effective school leaders.

The course requires participants to complete 160 hours of classroom work during four months. Besides law and curriculum, other major areas of study include personnel management, communications, self-knowledge, technology and personal development.

Participants must read, complete study guides and discuss the contents of 13 books, 80 articles and 30 case studies assigned by the 61 faculty members. They also must write papers on their educational philosophy and school leadership. Each must develop a long-range plan to improve an aspect of his or her school.

"The program's rigorous management education seeks long-lasting changes in the principal as a leader," said Robert Phay, program director and William R. Kenan, Jr., professor of public law and government. "We teach the importance of raising expectations for students, faculty and parents; how to increase school effectiveness; and the need to develop and implement long-range school goals with the heavy involvement of faculty, staff and parents."

With the graduation of this group, 1,119 of the state's public school administrators -- including 89 superintendents from three separate superintendents' programs -- have completed the Principals' Executive Program since it began in 1984. It is the longest-in-residence management program for school principals in the nation.
