

The Answer.
 By Joseph G. Cannon
 The Adams bill was passed. I voted for it. The President made an address to the Congress. In that address to Congress August 29, 1916, the President made six recommendations for legislation: First, the enlargement and administrative reorganization of the Interstate Commerce Commission; Second, the establishment of the eight-hour day as the legal basis for work and wages of all railway employees engaged in interstate transportation; Third, the authorization of a small body of men to observe the actual results of the eight-hour day and report to Congress; Fourth, approval of an increase of freight rates to meet such additional expenditures by reason of the eight-hour day; Fifth, an amendment of the existing Federal statute which provides for mediation, conciliation and arbitration of such controversies as the President by adding to it a provision that in case the methods of accommodation now provided for should fail, a full public investigation of the merits of every such dispute shall be instituted and completed before a strike or lockout may lawfully be attempted; and, Sixth, judgment in the hands of the Executive of the power, in case of military necessity, to take control of the railways for military service.
 I agree with much that he recommended. I voted for the Adams bill, not that I love it, but because it met an emergency and we had the untried promise of a permanent system for the adjustment of such controversies. It was a condition that confronted us. The President made certain propositions that he thought ought to be entered into laws that the whole must be considered to be determined by mediation and conciliation. I do not object to that. I believe in conciliation and I believe in mediation, where employer and employee cannot agree. He was entirely practical. Congress has not been practical. Now let us have laws, let us have mediation and when the award is made, let it be the judgment of the Court. That is what Woodrow Wilson recommended. That is what I have always believed in."—From speech printed in Congressional Record, November 17, 1919.
