All to Work Now.

The suspension is over. The injunction proceedings have been temporarily adjusted, and the result is what follows. Only one side—the defendants—would say anything for publication, an interview with Mr. Coffin is, therefore the only source of information.

Counsel for both sides met Judge W. S. C. B. Robinson, in chambers, at Marshall on the 23rd of February and agreed upon a compromise.

The terms of the agreement are very satisfactory, and they substantially confirm the conditions of the original contract.

The document is too lengthy to publish in full, but enough will be given to allow the reader to form an accurate idea of what the balance is.

In part the terms are these: "It is ordered that said defendants shall forthwith proceed to saw all the logs cut from the said Whittier tract, wherever situated, and pile the lumber upon their yard in Bryson City, according to contract; that said defendants may immediately proceed to cut other timber from the said tract of any kind, quality and size, and the said defendants shall, as rapidly as possible convert them into lumber."

There are many other provisions made for less important considerations, but those already quoted are the ones in which most interest centers.

The only difference between the order of the court and the contract is a provision for a lumber inspector, who shall have the disposition of the products of the mill, and who shall keep an account of the logs cut and lumber sawed.

This means that as soon as the kinks can be worked out of the business, some additions made to the plant and other details arranged, the mill will be started and the big force of men again put to work on Deep creek.

For several days the report that as soon as the logs already at the mill could be cut the plant would be moved to the mouth of Oconee Luffa river, has been flying in every direction, but having traced the story to its supposed source, the reporter is in position to state that it is only worthless hearsay.

ENGLAND VS. AMERICA.

A Proposal to Establish International College Athletics.

The Idea Meets with Much Favor from College Men in This Country—How the Teams Should Be Selected—A London Opinion.

From what is seen in the Harvard papers, those having charge of the athletics in that institution are very much in favor of a meeting between a representative American team and a representative English team some time in the near future. Mr. Lathrop of Harvard seems to think that there are difficulties in the way which cannot at present be surmounted, because the English training season ends in March, and they would either have to start up training again after discontinuing it, or else remain in continuous training until June. The June examinations would have a disastrous effect on an American team, and they would either have to enter a contest not in perfect condition or lose part of their summer vacation. There is something in this as far as the Englishmen are concerned, but it certainly would not be much for an American student to forego part of his vacation if he had the privilege of contesting on an all-American team in an international contest. One of the most prominent athletes in Harvard is quoted as saying that he recommends that "the championship be settled between Harvard and Yale, and the victorious team represent the country as against the English universities. Pennsylvania might take part in the preliminary contests to settle the intercollegiate championship. This year Pennsylvania is simply entitled to this honor. She has had the best football team in the country, will probably have an unequalled baseball team, and has exceptionally good material for track athletics. But the great trouble with the Quakers is their uncertainty. The chances are that next year their prestige in all three departments of athletic prowess will be a thing of the past. The tug of war over the championship is practically sure to come between Harvard and Yale alone."

It is but natural that an opinion such as this should be held about a college which has come to the front rapidly, and whose athletic record, except during the past three years, has not been an exceptional one. The great uncertainty of the Quakers must refer to the surprises which they have initiated upon unsuspecting teams with whom she has played. If any Pennsylvania men are chosen to represent the American colleges, they can be relied upon to the last to do their best. With certainty it can be said her athletic prowess will not be a thing of the past next year.

The Yale-Oxford games last summer attracted so much attention in English sporting circles that this year there is a decided sentiment in favor of a renewal of the contest.

No less authority than London Sporting Life announced editorially a short while ago that, as far as the English sentiment went, games would undoubtedly be arranged between Yale, Harvard, Oxford and Cambridge. The periodical above mentioned is the authority on all athletic questions in England, and there is no doubt but that it voices the feelings of all English university men.

Certainly yearly contests between the crack athletes of the two great branches of the English-speaking race would do much to purify athletics, as only men with unblemished records would be allowed to compete, and to be chosen as a member of the all-American team to contend for supreme honors with the picked athletes of England would be an honor worthier the striving for than even the winning of a first at Mett Haven.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

Good Horse Sense in Asses.

The Mexican burros ascertain where to dig for water by closely observing the surface of the ground. We had found in an arroya a sufficient quantity of water to make coffee, when we observed three burros searching for water. They passed several damp places, examining the ground closely, when the leader halted near us and commenced to paw a hole in the dry, hot sand with his right forefoot. After awhile he used his left forefoot. Having dug a hole something over a foot in depth, he backed out and watched it intently. To our surprise it soon commenced to fill with water. Then he advanced and took a drink and stepped aside, inviting, I think, the others to take a drink; at all events they promptly did so, and then went away, when we got down and took a drink from their well. The water was cool and refreshing, much better, in fact, than we had found for many a day. There is no witchcraft about the Mexican burros, but they have good horse sense.—Pittsburgh Dispatch.

A RED TAPE STORY.

A Man Who Mailed a Silver Half Dollar to England.

What He Received for His Coin — He is Still Looking for the Paper He Tried to Buy — A Funny Experience.

Next time William Arnold wants a back number of some British weekly he will enclose a five-dollar bill in an envelope and mail it to the publishers. He has just had a little experience in foreign trade which makes him feel that way, says the Chicago Times.

Every Friday when he leaves the bank down town he drops into a news store and buys a lot of technical papers. His hobby is naval affairs and he knows more about battleships and cruisers than many a naval officer.

In an issue of the London paper "E—," not long ago, there was a long article descriptive of two new fast steamers. The copies for sale were gone when Mr. Arnold called at the news store. Next day he stuck half a dollar into a hole in a piece of cardboard. He also wrote a note to the London publisher asking for a copy of the paper. Then he covered both with an envelope, put a five-cent stamp on the corner and dropped it into a box hung on a lamp post. The paper cost the English equivalent of a quarter, and Mr. Arnold believed he was quite liberal in sending another quarter for expenses and postage.

A bulky letter with an English stamp in the corner was dropped on his desk by the postman the other day. When he cut the end open a letter, a square of English postage stamps, and his own envelope dropped out. The envelope was a sight. A big blue cross was penciled on its face, along with half a dozen stamp prints showing various figures and letters. On the back a little printed notice covered the flap. It read:

"Caution — Valuable inclosures should never be forwarded in unregistered letters, as they incur serious risk thereby, while if sent in registered letters they are practically safe. With the view of giving greater security to such packets and to protect the servants of the post office from temptation, all letters unquestionably containing coin, jewelry or watches are registered, even though no application has been made for registration, and in such cases a special registration fee of eight pence is levied. This letter has been registered to cause it contains coin."

When he laid that down he looked at the stamps. There were just eleven of them, all stuck together, each of the value of one penny. But the letter was a revelation. After politely informing Mr. Arnold that the paper was out of print, the writer explained: "From the envelope which covered your letter, and which I now return, you will see that we had to pay one shilling and one penny before we could get it from the post office, as it is contrary to postal regulations in this country to inclose coin in an unregistered letter, and the practice of the post office is to register the letter compulsorily and charge a special fee of eight pence. Your letter was also over-weight, and the charge for this was five pence, making up, as above stated, one shilling and one penny. I send you herewith English stamps, value eleven pence, as the balance of the two shillings remitted by you."

Mr. Arnold figures that he has received for his half dollar:

One letter of explanation.
 Eleven useless English stamps.
 One beautifully marked envelope.
 One lot of experience.

He is looking for a copy of the paper yet.
