Q. What other advantage has Alabastine that kalsomines do not posses A. Alabastine is entirely different from all kalsomines. It is manufactured from a base in itself a cement, and when applied to a wall sets hard. Q. How do kalsomines differ from this? A. Kalsomines are made from whiting, cays, chalks or some inert powder for a base, and are entirely dependent on animal glue to hold them on the wall. Q. What are the results? A. In one case the Alabastine being a cement hardens with age, and the kalsomine as soon as the glue, which constitutes its binding quality decays, rubs and scales off, as it has nothing to hold it on the wall. Q. Does Alabastine require washing and scraping off before coating? A. No; Alabastine when once applied to a clean surface can be recoated for any length of time without having to wash or scrape the walls. Q. Does this feature count for much? A. Ask any practical housekeeper who has been driven from home to have walls washed and scrape I, whether it will be desirable to have all of this overcome, and walls improved instead of spoiled by coat-

KING KBMORA.

SOUTH SEA ISLAND POTEN TATE IN THIS COUNTRY,

He is Tall and Stout and Doesn't Feel Easy in the Clothes of Civilization - His Impressions of San Francisco.

AN FRANCISCO has been en tertaining royalty in the person of King Kbmora of the island of Butaritari, one of the Gilbert group of South Sea Islands. He came in a trading schooner. There was no salute fired for him as the vessel bearing his Majesty slipped through the Golden Gate, yet all the same he is more of a monarch than King Kalakaua, who was the last crowned head that San Francisco entertained, for Kbmora's word is law to the 2000 subjects over whom he rules and he has the power of life and death over every one of them.

The King is a bigger man than John L. Sullivan, and weighs 260 pounds. He has very little superfluous flesh. It is all hard muscle. He wears a close beard His eye is large, full and intelligent, and his whole appearance amiable and the same time full of dignity.

. It is still trying for the King to wear civilized clothes, though he has worn them for some time now, and when seen in a black Prince Albert coat and trousers he looked as miserable as he evidently felt. His clothes don't fit him, and, worst of all, he has to wear shoes that make him clump about exactly as though he were shod with horseshoes.

His suite consists of his nephow, Prince Antavur, and his interpreter, who is known as Jack the Pilot. These two are fully a head shorter than the King, and look like children beside him. It seems that the royal family of Butaritari, like that of Hawaii, is made up of men and women who are much larger than their subjects. Whether this was due to the selection of the most warlike chiefs in the beginning, who in turn choose wives of unusual stature, is un certain, but the fact remains that there is as great a difference between the King and his followers as there is between a Japanese wrestler and an ordinary subject of the Mikado. The Prince is a good-looking young fellow, but Jack the Pilot has the appearance of a waterfront wonder. His cheeks are shrivelled, four ot his front teeth are gone, and he looks as though he had been through many campaigns. He is the only one of the party that speaks any English, and his English is not much better than the pigeon lingo of a newly arrived Chinese Captain White, of the schooner Tarawa, who brought the King and his suite, said that the monarch had a very soft billet in Butaritari, but the monotony of South Sea life recently began to pall upon him, and having heard of the wonders of the white man's country, he concluded to take a trip to Frisco. It was a good deal of an undertaking, for these people do not like to go far from home, though they are perfectly willing to hire out as laborers anywhere in the South Seas, with the chance of returning at the end of three years, when their contract has expired. The King is his own Chancellor of the Exchequer, and handles the privy purse. His revenue comes from the sale of cocoanuts. The natives pay their taxes in this fruit, and the King disposes of his ware to the San Francisco trading schooners. He also draws a good revenue from pilot fees in the harbor of Butaritari and from fines which he imposes on any native who fails to attend church regularly or to observe properly the frequent national holidays. Like the Hawaiian sovereign he also comes in for very handsome presents from his subjects on all the holidays. On the island he is very accessible to visitors, but he preserves the same diguity at an audience that clothes him here.

When the reporter saw him the King was sweltering in his heavy broadcloth suit and looked as though he would enjoy noting so much as a header in the bay. The perspiration was trickling down each cheek, but he never moved a muscle or made a sign of discontent. He had the air of a Sioux chief who knew he was on exhibition, and who would die before he would show any more sign of life or interest than a cigar-store Indian. His followers gave vent to exclamations of wonder, but the monarch disdained any expression of vulgar feeling. Only his eyes showed that he was profoundly impressed by all these trappings of civilization that were so new and strange to him. During his first night on shore he was taken up to the top of the Chronicle building, which is the loftiest structure in the city, and was asked to look over the parapet of the tower down to the pavement, 210 feet below. His eyes bulged, his hair rose slightly, and the great chief was badly frightened. He emitted a series of grunts, which the interpreter translated as "No good!" In fact, the King wanted to get to earth again.

The electric lights and the tangle of wires of the telephone and telegraph impressed him deeply. His interpretor said the automatic ringing of their bells by cable car gripmen reminded the King of the occasional steamers that visit his island home, and when he first heard the deep roar of the trucks and carriages on Market street he said it sounded like the surf on Butaritari. This was about all that any one got out of the King that night. He made the round of the newspaper offices, and in each sat up like a graven image and stood admiring and curious glances with the sang froid of a professional beauty.

Jack the Pilot tried to explain what the King was thinking about, but he made bad work of it because of his lack of vocabulary. He told how eager the King was to improve the condition of his people, and that this trip was taken in order that the monarch might gather any suggestions for improving Butaritari. The King has built a two-story palace and mounted a gun in front of it. He has also imported some furniture for his wife and his niece, but he himself does not take kindly to civilized ways. The black suit he wears on all high occasions of religious ceremony. He is a very devout Christian, and says his prayers with great earnestness every morning. Unlike many of his subjects, he seems to have no taste for tobacco or liqour, and he does all in his power to prevent his people from acquiring these vices of the white man.

The monarch has lost three of his front teeth and his interpreter has four teeth missing. The party saw a big gilt tooth in front of a dentist's office, and when it was explained that the man inside made new teeth. Jack the Pilot grinnel all over his scarry face and said: "Then me be young again and get new tooth!" He also communicated this intelligence to the King, who grunted his approval. The natives will probably be amazed on the return of their King to find that he has grown a new set of teeth during his absence-a sea change which will strike them with wonder.

Perhaps the thing that has struck him as forcibly as any he has seen here is a big biscuit factory. He spont several hours watching the process of converting barrels of flour into crackers and sea biscuit, and he expressed his wonder to the interpreter that so much "grub" should be gathered in one house. One of the King's recreations is to take off his shoes at night and walk up and down Market street on the cool stone pavement. It seems to give him great pleasure to allow his feet the liberty that a boot denies him.

A. Crawford, who does more business with the islands than any other merchant here, secured quarters for the King at a hotel on Second street much frequented by mariners. Here the King and Jack the Pilot met many old acquaintances, and every night they held quite a levee.

In talking about Butaritari, Crawford said the island was one of the most peculiar in the South Seas. It was on no place over ten feet above sea level, and the soil was so thin that no agriculture was possible. Only the cocoanut and the banana grew with tropical luxuriance. A slip of either stuck in the salt marshy soil grew into a big tree an l furnished shade and food-the two things that are needful. Life was so easy for the natives that they could not be induced to do any work, except when the cocoanuts and bananas failed. The islanders are honest, truthful and goo! natured, and they have been less spoiled by civilization than the Samoans because no steamers call at Butaritari and no tourists visit the place. Robert Louis Stevenson took in the island on his famous trip in the yacht Casco, and he conceived a great fancy for the King. They hobnobbed together for days, though they could carry on no conversation except by signs. The King enforces religious observances on the island. The natives have many traditions, but their records are meagre, and no one seems to know how old he is. Even the age of the King is not known. They are very hospitable to strangers, and often they have given valuable aid to shipwrecked sailors. They are a simple-minded, amiable people, who will disappear entirely should the island ever become a station on the highway of travel.—San Francisco Chronicle.

A "Salted" Colorado Mine.

Funny was the salting of a mine in Colorado, which was bought by ex-Senator Tabor by order from some friends of his in Denver. Chicken Bill, a prospector of rather disreputable notoriety, did the job, performing it so successfully that $40,000 was paid over to him for the property without any question. He was so elated over the transaction as to be unable to keep the secret, communicating it to a number of intimate friends. In this manner the news reached Denver, and the people who had employed Tabor left upon his hands, determined to make, the best of the situation and proceeded to dig further in the hole. He pierced the rock ten feet further and came upon a body of ore which preved to be one of the richest ever found in the State .-Washington Star.

As a method of encouraging business, Watt, offered to sell engines reckoning 33,000 foot pounds to a horse-power, or onethird more than the actual.

The Burro is Not a Beauty.

The burro is not a pretty beast, but in the wild western plains he is sometimes very useful. The burros instinctively know where water is to be found, and if miners have been out a day or two without water, they are very liable to be deserted by their jacks, the animals breaking away and rushing off in the direction of the nearest pool. More than one party of prospectors or travelers has been saved from perishing of thirst by the instinct-or intelligence, or whatever else you please to call it-of the burros, for these animals, even if haltered, will smell the water when they cannot go to it, and give brays of joy at its proximity.
