THE LAST DUTY DONE.

We give place to the occasion. Heart and mind are full of the sad associations of suggestions of great concurrent scenes, of mournings.

And over the grave about to be filled up to-day may South and North unite with holy purpose to make of our common country what it always has been—the land of the free and the home of the brave.

Let others think of him and his life work as they may, in Southern sentiment and esteem, Jefferson Davis has left to us an imperishable heritage of incorruptible manhood and undying devotion to what we call duty.

For twenty-five years his figure has stood out in bold relief. He has challenged attention not by reason of his military record, nor because he sat for four years in the secret council chamber of the President of the United States.

But a change more notable than this has taken place, a change which has been preparing for years, but which needed the sounding of the death-knell in New Orleans to bring it out in its completeness.

in the South the character of Lincoln and Grant. Had this death occurred during those years, the contest would have left its traces and embittered the last hours.

From all parts of the country the eyes of the American people are turned to that funeral, but with respectful and even reverent attention.

We learn that the officers of the United States army stationed in New Orleans admired his character and will personally, although not officially, attend his funeral.

The services of this hour, my friends, are hushed with an inexpressible pathos. The thrilling memories, associations and events of the dark days that are gone, come trooping up as we stand in the presence of this noble personality.

Let others think of him and his life work as they may, in Southern sentiment and esteem, Jefferson Davis has left to us an imperishable heritage of incorruptible manhood and undying devotion to what we call duty.

Even those who wore the laurels of popular adoration are not exempt; for the path of glory leads but to the grave.

THE RACKET COLUMN.
